Wildcat strikes hit Israel

By SARAH HONIG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Histadrut escalated its concerted campaign of scheduled selective strikes in different sectors of the economy on Monday, after throwing the country into chaos the previous afternoon with wildcat strikes.

The actions were said to cause considerable losses both in financial terms and in terms of the country's economic prestige, as numerous sectors of the economy were affected, including ports, Bezek, banks, post offices, government health services, government offices, the Israel Broadcasting Authority except for news broadcasts, WIZO and Na'amat day care centres, trains, the Histadrut, Magen David Adom, fire and rescue services and buses. However airports were spared, although 60 scheduled flights were disrupted due to Sunday's sudden walkout. On Monday Histadrut leaders met to decide where strike action will hit next.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Finance Minister Dan Meridor lashed out at the Histadrut and accused it of sponsoring a political campaign against the government. The employers urged Netanyahu to seek back-to-work orders and threatened to withhold deductions from employees' wages, which constitute the chief source of income for the Histadrut.

The spark which ostensibly led to the wildcat action at midday on Sunday was the detention of Histadrut Trade Union Department chair Shlomo Shani, who had gone underground over the weekend after the Tel Aviv Labor Court ruled

Hebron talks down to the wire

By DAVID MAKOVSKY
AND JON IMMANUEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — U.S. Special Middle East peace talks envoy Dennis Ross was scheduled to lead the final stages of the protracted Hebron talks this week.

Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat said he hoped the agreement would be initialled this Wednesday. One U.S. official said Washington is heartened by what they call Egypt's "support for the Palestinians wrapping up the talks," in contrast to past opposition.

Arafat returned from Cairo for talks with Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai to finalize Hebron security issues.

Israeli and Palestinian negotiators met in Jerusalem to draft a protocol that will allow the Jewish settlers in Hebron some control over building in their area and will limit the height of Arab building in the immediate vicinity.

Palestinians went out of their way to say nothing had yet been finalized, and Arafat said in Cairo that all issues were still open. But he has used this as a tactic to add weight to the Palestinians' demands in the past. PA officials have privately admitted this, and no major changes are expected between now and the signing of the final agreement.

Officials in Jerusalem sharply deny reports of unnamed Palestinian officials suggesting that Israel will give dates on all three further pull backs. One official said that Israel would only be providing a definite date for the first pull back.

A U.S. official said that if the past is a guide, an Israeli-Palestinian peace agreement would not be complete without a ritualistic last minute crisis, so each side can convince skeptical colleagues that everything has been tried.

The one issue on which Israelis and Palestinians have not found a joint formula concerns a Palestinian official presence at the Machpela Cave.

For security reasons, the previous government demanded exclusive control there, fearing that divided control could only encourage rather than discourage incidents. A joint mobile patrol based at the cave may resolve the difficulty.

Arafat is now trying to secure a Palestinian presence at the Machpela Cave in direct talks with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, since it is not to be found in the Hebron guidelines of the Oslo 2 agreement.

A U.S. document spelling out the readiness of the two sides to continue the process will be attached to the agreement.

Meanwhile, officials in the Prime Minister's Office say Netanyahu does not want a big peace ceremony as part of the signing of the Hebron accord. As one U.S. official put it, "The image this government wants to create is one of anguish and not celebration."

An aide to Netanyahu said, "We want something low-key. This prime minister doesn't want balloons. The last government believed ceremonies had a favorable psychological impact on the population. We don't subscribe to this point of view."

BAR-LEV WARNS EGYPT NOT TO RENEW HOSTILITIES

Israel's retiring Chief of Staff Gen. Haim Bar-Lev served notice on Cairo that any renewal of warfare would bring swift and destructive retaliation against Egypt. "If the Egyptians attempt to hit any civilian targets in Israel we can retaliate in kind with such force that they would quickly drop whatever plans they have," Bar-Lev said.

PROPOSED TAX ON BAR MITZVAS SUPPORTED

Reaction to outgoing UJWF president Donald Carr's statement suggesting a levy on Bar Mitzvas and weddings to combat huge education deficits has been generally enthusiastic.

All of the rabbis polled are in favor of smaller banquets. Several noted that lavish Bar Mitzvas are not part of Jewish tradition.

"Caterers should be taxed for every simcha and part of it should go to tzedaka," Rabbi Hershe Nussbaum of Agudath Israel said.

"In the majority of cases," he said, "the ones who make the large simchas are the ones who donated heavily to charity anyway."

CJC's future role on agenda of CJF Canada

Proposals a starting point for discussions

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Moving the national office of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) to Ottawa, selling its Montreal headquarters and absorbing CJC regional offices in Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver into the federation structures will be among the important issues to be discussed between CJC and the Council of Jewish Federations Canada (CJF Canada) leaders when they meet Jan. 18 to 20 in Toronto.

These subjects were among several controversial proposals to CJC leadership in a Nov. 21 memo sent by Richard Vineberg, president of CJF Canada, Canadian-Jewish federations' umbrella body and CJC's funder.

The proposals sparked concern among CJC leaders, who fear that implementing them would be tantamount to eviscerating Congress and having it taken over by the federations.

But Vineberg, in an interview with The CJN, stressed that the "proposals" contained in the memo should be seen as nothing other than a starting point for vital discussions between equal partners.

"As responsible organizations we have to be talking to one another," he said.

Vineberg emphasized that nothing has been decided "in any way, shape, or form" despite the recommendation that a joint FEDERATION CJA-CJC committee be "immediately appointed to arrange the sale or transfer of responsibility for this site [CJC headquarters] to another Jewish or non-Jewish organization."

"I'm not saying [moving Congress] is necessarily the right thing to do," he said. "We are constantly holding internal discussions [with CJC] as responsible Jewish community leaders. There is a constant dialogue going on. But it's healthy to question each other about it."

Frank Schlesinger, CJC's national secretary, told The CJN he was prepared to give Vineberg the benefit of the doubt, hoping CJC and CJF Canada could work things out in a spirit of goodwill.

But there was no arguing that the wording of the Nov. 21 memo set off shock waves within Congress. As a result, about 10 days later, on Dec. 2, Vineberg wrote a second memo to president Goldie Hershon saying the original memo was "misconstrued" and regretting the "misinterpretation of our intent by certain people within your organization to inhibit the close working relationship we are building..."

In the second memo he wrote, the proposals were intended to aid CJC in its own "strategic planning process; they neither represent our [CJF Canada's] views on the full gamut of CJC activities, nor are [they] intended to be the only possible option you have to address the issues."

Still, while seeking to assuage concern over the proposals, Vineberg did not rule any of them out. All the options have to be discussed out of the "collective concern to be as efficient as possible" in terms of the use of human and financial resources.

Vineberg could not say whether it was necessary to merge the three CJC regional offices in Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver into the respective federation structure. He did note however, that, "in seven out of 10 regions, the federations and the [CJC] regional offices are the same."

Similarly, as a Quebecer, Vineberg was reticent about discussing what the perception in the province would be were the CJC-national office to move to Ottawa to become the "national advocacy office" for CJC, CIC, and, possibly, JIAS. But he suggested that such a consideration would be secondary to the overall priority of CJC "fulfilling its mandate."

Other proposals in the original Nov. 21 memo include:

- Introducing "joint planning initiatives" between CJF Canada and its "member partners...in order to serve the whole Jewish community in Canada."
- Transferring all but CJC's political, CRC (community relations committee)-related responsibilities in small, unfederated communities to the "proposed, merged entity of UIA and CJF Canada"
- Reviewing the need for CJC's Youth Services portfolio in light of CJF Canada's national campus services committee and the possible duplication of efforts with and competition between other Jewish organizations' initiatives.
- Ensuring the "optimal use" of federation funding to prevent "duplication" or "overlap" in terms of the Israel-related advocacy activities of CJC's Israel affairs committee, the Canada-Israel Committee and UIA Canada.
- Discussing the "scope and function" of CJC's international affairs activities.

In the first memo, Vineberg says that while CJF Canada "recognize(s) the independent status of CJC, we must ensure that communal resources are applied to initiatives that reflect out mutually agreed upon priorities."

He also asked CJC to prepare a "draft discussion paper" in response to the memo, as the starting point for a six-month review process to be completed by July 1, 1997, when the next fiscal year begins.

By that time, any budgeting changes related to organizational restructuring would have to be finalized.

Separatists losing unity fight: Galganov

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Federalist forces in Quebec will do everything in their power to make sure distinct society status for the province doesn't happen, Montreal anglo rights activist Howard Galganov pledged here recently.

"If they [separatists] can do to us what they've been doing without distinct society [status], imagine what they'd do with it," Galganov told a small audience at Shaarei Tefillah Congregation.

Federalists are "not just beating [separatists], we're creaming them. It's a rout. And now, we're back to distinct society. We will use every ounce of energy to make sure [distinct society status] never gets off the ground.

Galganov, who has won wide support as well as condemnation for his opposition to Quebec nationalism and separatism, said he has received death threats and there has been a kidnapping attempt against his wife.

He said his home and business are guarded around the clock.

Last spring, Galganov led a boycott of some big-name merchants at a west-end mall in Montreal because their signs were in French only. Quebec law says signs may be bilingual as long as French is twice as predominant.

The stores relented after demonstrations were held against them, which attracted wide media coverage.

Howard Galganov

Since then, Galganov has been at the centre of an often rancorous fight between federalist and nationalist forces in Quebec. He says he's been vilified in the French press as "a Jewish terrorist" because he once belonged to the Jewish Defence League.

Galganov founded the grassroots Quebec Political Action Committee, and recently opened a store posting bilingual signs with English and French equally displayed, in defiance of the language law.

He's openly dared Quebec language inspectors to cite him in violation of the law.

Galganov's Toronto audience consisted of about 25 people, most of them, by a show of hands, former Montrealers. But their response was enthusiastic, given that at evening's end, almost everyone made donations to Galganov's organization.

It's time Jews especially stood up to Quebec nationalism, he said, "because our history has shown that when we did nothing, we lost six million people. We never seem to learn."

As a Jew, Galganov said he feels "substantially more vulnerable" living in Quebec. But he vowed to press on because "no one is going to negotiate my rights. They're non-negotiable. Either we all share equal rights or none of us have rights."

Galganov predicted there will not be a third referendum because separatists "can't win it."

will return next week.

Pollards respond to 'attacks' from their critics

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Jonathan Pollard has denied a Toronto Star story that both questioned the legitimacy of his mariage and blamed his Toronto-based wife, Esther, for an estrangement between him and his family.

In a statement given to his wife, which she delivered to The CJN, Pollard declared: "It is untrue that Jewish marriages are registered by a civil authority in Granville, N.C. The rabbi who married us did not need authorization from any civil authority, nor was he obliged to register the marriage with any civil authority."

Esther Pollard said the Star story is aimed not at her, but at Pollard himself and is a continuing effort by some of the media to deflect attention from the severity of the life sentence meted out to her husband for handing over secret documents to Israel while in the employ of the United States navy.

The attacks on her and her husband have intensified since Pollard applied for Israeli citizenship, she said.

"I know that prison officials were contacted by Ha'aretz [an Israeli daily] and the Toronto Star, and in both cases, they refused to be interviewed and made none of the statements attributed to them," Pollard said in his statement.

"Can you tell me how it is supposed to further my case when my own sister insists that I am unbalanced and have lost touch with reality, and that I am unrepentant and unremorseful. Is it any wonder that I asked her to remove herself from the case?"

Esther Pollard also released an updated version of an earlier statement by her husband responding to attacks on their marriage.

It read: "Over the past six years my wife, Esther, has been subjected to a well-coordinated and unrelenting stream of abuse. It is critical for people to understand though, she is not the intended target of this attack. I am.

"I am shocked and deeply saddened by the fact that this attack has been largely directed by members of my own family, certain so-called 'friends' and the Public Committee for Pollard in Israel.

"The villification of my wife has now escalated to the point where I can no longer remain silent. To remove any lingering doubt on this score, I wish to make it very clear that, as far as I am concerned, Esther speaks for me on all matters pertaining to my case. I also fully intend to defend myself from any attacks directed at me through her, regardless as to their origins."

Hadassah-WIZO welcomes new president

TORONTO — Canadian Hadassah-WIZO pledged the support of its entire membership to ensure the "continued well-being, viability and commitment to the people of Israel" at its recent 35th national convention held at the Sheraton Centre in Toronto.

The convention, which drew hundreds of delegates from 28 Canadian centres, honored outgoing national president, Judy Mandleman and welcomed newly elected national president Patricia Joy Alpert.

At the opening brunch, 11 Women of Achievement, among them Judge Rosalie Abella, Justice Court of Appeals, Ontario; Diane Frances, editor, Financial Post and Sheila Finestone, Liberal MP, were honored. The ceremonies included welcoming remarks from Mandleman, David Sultan, ambassador of Israel to Canada; and Michal Modai, president of World WIZO. Keynote speaker was Yuli Edestein, minister of immigration and absorption, Israel.

The Canadian Award, given to Canadians who have displayed exemplary humanitarian qualities and who have made a significant contribution to Canada, was presented to Mme. Justice Claire L'Heureux-Dubé, Supreme Court Justice, who expressed her "deep appreciation of the intense commitment and involvement of the organization to the well-being of humanity."

The Rebecca Sieff Award given to those who have made significant contribution to the welfare and well-being of Israel, was presented to Edgar Brofman, president, World Jewish Congress, for his "dedication to the cause of the Jewish people in Israel and throughout the world."

Speakers included Yehiel Leket, head, Youth Aliyah Unit of the Jewish Agency; John Loftus, author and former prosecutor with the United States Justice Department's Nazi War Crimes Unit; Bernie Farber, national director of community relations, Canadian Jewish Congress; Deborah B. Kaplan, coordinator, Hadassah International.

Blood drive planned to aid Crohn's patient

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Randi Spiegel knows she needs blood when the mere act of standing up leaves her feeling that she is about to pass out.

At the age of 29, Spiegel has lived with Crohn's disease for the past 15 years. Complications of the chronic inflammatory bowel condition cause her frequent internal bleeding; for the past two years she has had weekly blood tests and received at least two units of packed red blood cells once a month.

On Jan. 9, she hopes to attend a Red Cross blood drive at the Promenade Mall in Thornhill sponsored by two chapters of Jewish Women International: Golda Meir, of which her mother Carol Spiegel is a member, and Northern Lights.

Randi moved back into her parents' house two years ago following surgery and an extended hospitalization. She has undergone a total of seven operations and was facing a possible eighth one at press time, having been admitted to hospital again shortly after being interviewed for this article.

Although she has been unable to work for the past two years, the graduate of Ryerson Polytechnic University's Radio and Television Arts program has been writing a book for children with Crohn's.

Until recently Carol was reticent about going public regarding her daughter's need for blood, but it was at her initiative that her chapter decided to volunteer for the upcoming clinic.

"As soon as she said the word, we jumped on it," said Sylvia Wein, chapter president. The group had been weighing their desire to help against their respect for Carol's privacy, she explained.

Carol has been gratified by the response of the three dozen women in her chapter. They are doing advance publicity and recruiting friends and family to donate; some will also be on hand to help at the clinic.

"They are doing it out of the goodness of their hearts. They're doing it for me, for Randi, and for the community," said Carol.

Although the women are asking donors to tell clinic staff they are there for Randi, donors are not allowed to designate a recipient for their blood, Carol and Randi stressed. "It will help a lot of people," said Carol.

"None of it will go to waste," Randi added.

The 61 area hospitals served by the Red Cross's Toronto Blood Centre need 650 units of blood a day, mostly for surgical and cancer patients, said Deborah Kuiper, the centre's clinic coordinator for York Region.

A well publicized shortage in December – traditionally a "crunch time" – resulted in some patients receiving less than the optimal amount of blood. Kuiper expects it will be February or possibly March before the Red Cross makes up the shortfall.

For Randi, donated blood makes a dramatic difference. "It could mean I wouldn't have to go in the hospital. My blood was so low last time they had to give me oxygen. It's too stressful on the body. I had heart pains and my arm was numb." When the symptoms are alleviated, Randi wishes she could thank the donor.

There are a lot of misconceptions about who can donate blood, Kuiper said. "People have a feeling that they have to be beyond average [good] health, like an extreme jock."

With certain restrictions, such as pregnancy within the last six months or the use of certain medications, healthy individuals from age 17 to 60 can be first-time donors; regular donors can continue to give blood until age 71.

Hesitant would-be donors are encouraged to visit the clinic. "Come have a coffee and ask questions, even if you don't feel ready to donate," said Kuiper.

The clinic will be held from 2 to 4 p.m. and 5 to 8 p.m., Jan. 9, on the lower level of the Promenade just outside Eaton's.

BJCC chapel dedicated in soldier's memory

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

TORONTO – Among the rows of crosses at the Canadian Forces Cemetery in Villanova, Italy, are two stars of David that mark the graves of two Jewish soldiers who died in combat 52 years ago.

David Devor and Michael Bernstein were killed during an attack on enemy positions on the Lamore River in Italy. They were recently remembered at a service to officially name the Michael Bernstein Chapel at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre, in memory of the Toronto-born soldier who died on Dec. 20, 1944.

Some 75 people crowded into the tiny chapel to join Bernstein's family for the dedication ceremony. Among the congregants was a veteran of the Irish Regiment, Charles Drubich of Toronto, who served alongside Devor and Bernstein in Italy. It was Drubich who found them and said Kaddish over the bodies before they were buried.

David Devore's brother, Lou, was also at the service, as were Jewish veterans from the Irish Regiment and a regiment representative.

The late Leonard Bernstein, chapel president for many years, and his brother Coleman refurbished the chapel in 1975 and dedicated it to the memory of their brother Michael, but there was no formal dedication ceremony. The recent service was planned to coincide with Michael's yahrzeit.

Plaque includes medals

After Leonard's death this summer, his family decided to have a plaque made for the chapel. The plaque, which includes Michael's picture, his medals, and information about the battles he fought, was unveiled as part of the chapel dedication ceremony.

"While the chapel bears his [Mike's] name, it is also dedicated to the memory of the Jewish men and women who made the supreme sacrifice," Coleman Bernstein said during the service.

Leonard's son Jeffrey recalled that his father was not interested in retrieving the medals awarded to him and his brother after the war. But Jeffrey, who was 6 years old at the time, picked up the medals and presented them to his father as a surprise. He noted that the sight of the medals upset his father, who, he said, believed that "there was no glory in war."

Michael Bernstein enlisted in 1940 at the age of 17, serving as a sergeant with the Royal Canadian Air Force and as a cadet in the Irish Regiment. He went overseas in 1941 and was in one of the first squadrons of amphibious tanks to hit the beach on D-Day. He was wounded in July 1944 and although he had a right to return home, he proceeded to Italy for a second tour of duty after his convalescence in England.

He was posthumously awarded the 1939-1945 Star, the War Medal, the Defence Medal, the Canada Volunteer Service Medal (with bar), as well as the France and German Stars.

"My uncle was a real hero," said Leonard's son Michael Bernstein, who is named for his uncle. "He died so young. He was only 21 when he died, but my father and my uncle have kept his memory alive for more than 50 years."

As with all things that are precious and little noticed day to day, we occasionally fall into a complacency about them which obscures their true dimension. Such is the case with the movement, the dream, the vision, the Hope – Zionism – the modern, sovereign embodiment of which is the state we love and call Israel.

Of all the "isms" and political ideologies which soared across the skyline of the 20th century, only Zionism altered heaven. The others, like comets that blaze momentarily before our eyes but leave nothing long-lasting, had their days, but now are gone.

Zionism though, restored a people to its land and a land to its people. Zionism was the sanctuary, the rallying cry that proclaimed after World War II to an indifferent world: "We shall not die but live." Israel is the home that gathers in its exiles. It is the millennial yearning to redeem Jerusalem "not by might but by My spirit." It is the state which defends itself by "purity of arms."

One hundred years ago, in the hot summer days of late August, in the Swiss mountain resort of Basel, the first Zionist Congress was convened under the guiding hand and undaunted initiative of Theodor Herzl. Hundreds of Jewish dreamers met, debated, argued and eventually propounded the Basel Program, the first sentence of which is printed elsewhere on this page. This program was and is still the driving force for collective Jewish responsibility around the world.

Two full generations have grown up since World War II. What our parents and grandparents saw with their eyes and felt with their hands and on their backs, we and our children will see and feel only in the pages of history. We must therefore try to remember to cast aside our all-too-human complacency lest we fail even momentarily to see and appreciate how precious and restorative and life-sustaining the dream of Zionism is.

The CJN begins its commemoration of the 100-year anniversary of this epoch-making event in this issue of the paper, the first of 1997. Each week we shall publish an excerpt from the first Congress. From time to time throughout the year, we shall publish other features connected with the anniversary.

When this anniversary draws to a close one year from now, we shall move seamlessly, please God, into another significant commemoration – the 50th anniversary of the fulfilment of Zionism's dream – the founding of the State of Israel.

Urgent matters

As the new year dawns, one wonders whether a number of urgent matters can be resolved in 1997:

When will the Canadian government stop dragging its feet and adopt a credible approach to the issue of alleged war criminals in this country? Canada's performance often leaves the impression that Ottawa prefers a biological solution.

When will the Swiss government do the right thing and finally come clean with regard to Switzerland's war record and its handling of bank accounts opened by Jews who perished in the Holocaust?

When will Argentina get to the bottom of the most dasdardly crime committed against the Jewish people since the Nazi era – the 1995 bombing of the Jewish community centre in Buenos Aires?

When will trust, the essential component of any relationship, be restored between Israel and the Palestinian Authority? – S.K.

Welcomes stories on Sephardi culture

I commend The CJN for publishing the excellent essay by Cantor Aviv Ouanounou. "Rabbi David Buzaglo: great poet and scholar" (Dec. 12).

As an admirer and lover of Sephardi-Jewish culture and tradition, I am grateful to Ouanounou for sharing with us the story of Rabbi Buzaglo.

The piyut published is a pearl of Sephardi poetry and stands up high on Sephardi piyutim tradition along with Samuel Ha-Nagid, Judah Halevi, Judah Al-Harizi, Dunash Ha-Levi, Ben Labrat – the finest flowering of Spanish Hebrew poetry.

I hope that The CJN will continue publishing articles on Sephardi Jewish culture and tradition, encouraging a closer relationship and better understanding between the Sephardi and Ashkenazi communities.

Reading Hebron valid comment on Israel

What a curious letter you published from Lorne Katz Dec. 12. If I read the letter correctly, what he says is that "because Jason Sherman has never been to Israel and I have not seen Reading Hebron, then this gives me the licence to say anything I like, which makes Jason Sherman look like an idiot."

But, of course, the comparison does not work. Israel is a text, provided for us openly on TV, radio and film, and in the shul, newspapers and 6,000 years of recorded history. We who have patience to do so read it, carefully. Going to Israel helps a bit, but the reading is what matters.

Katz may have read some of his Israel, but obviously not his Sherman, whose text is a mere 1½ hours long in performance. But, of course, he doesn't want to, nor really to "read" Israel. His "my country right or wrong" does not echo Jeremiah's or the Isaiah's, but sounds more like an old English Colonel Blimp.

At least Jason Sherman knows his prophets and the role of the true Rebbe. Does Katz know the Talmud at all?

Objects to interpretation of poem

Gidi Koren, Hebrew columnist of The CJN, in his review of Dalia Revikowitz's poem, Two Islands from New Zealand, misinterprets, in my opinion, her intention.

She writes: "I will not journey to Africa/ Nor to Asia/ I will not travel at all."

These lines implicitly indicate that in spite of all the difficulties living in Israel encompasses, she will not leave. Koren's interpretation of the New Zealand reference does not seem to me to be correct at all.

Come to Israel with us!

Many of our Jewish friends and acquaintances admit that they are afraid to travel to Israel.Some have never been there! Yet I have never heard anyone cancel their trips to London because of the subway and theatre district bombing. Now a Canadian woman was killed by a bomb in the Paris subway. Do Canadian Jews cancel their planned trip there?

Come to Israel with us! There have been atrocities, and knowing the human values of the perpetrators, we know that there will be others in the future. But with all that, nowhere do we feel as safe as in Israel. Cancel your trip to London and Paris and come to Israel with us!

Perspectives

Canada ignored war criminals for 27 years

Ten years ago, Jules Deschênes delivered his report on the Commission of Inquiry on War Criminals. In a two-part article, the first of which we publish today, Arnold Fradkin examines where the judge's report has led us. Part II will appear next week.

By ARNOLD FRADKIN

Many of the individuals who actively took part in the scheme to destroy European Jewry are now in Canada. In an article in the Globe and Mail on May 26, 1987, Irving Abella (former president of the Canadian Jewish Congress and a well respected historian), pointed out that for a time, Canadian immigration policy was such "that a United Nations official in a displaced persons camp remarked that it was 'easier' for Nazis to come to Canada than for survivors of the death camps. The Nazis could provide proof of their anti-communist credentials — at that time the sine qua non for immigration into Canada." Abella went on to say that Canada "became an attractive haven for Nazis when, at the behest of the British Government in 1948, we agreed not to undertake any war crime prosecutions. This was the price former West German chancellor Konrad Adenauer demanded from the Western allies for agreeing to re-arm his nation and turn it into an anti-Soviet bastion."

Few of these criminals and their major collaborators have been brought before the bar of justice. In Canada, there has been only one successful proceeding — the case against Jacob Luitjens, who, after a long trial in the Federal Court of Canada, was stripped of his citizenship and then summarily deported to Holland, and placed in jail. Proceedings against Luitjens were initiated in January 1988 and the trial began eight months later (September 1988) in Vancouver. To date that is Canada's only successful action against Nazi war criminals or collaborators since the special project began as a result of the Deschênes Commission Report.

Keith Spicer wrote in a 1987 article in Southam News: "The very least that decency requires is that justice follow its course until all the actors in the murderous play, have died." Unless we deal with the suspected war criminals living unhindered, unrepentant and unpunished in Canada, what moral authority is there for us as a nation to participate in bringing more recent war criminals in Bosnia, Somalia, Rawanda or elsewhere to justice?

Justice does not mean vengence. It means redress according to principles of law, as imposed by courts of law after a fair and impartial trial according to law. Jurists have often defined justice by pointing out what it is not. It is not justice for Nazi war criminals and collaborators to find a safe haven in Canada. Justice demands the removal of such a haven — either by ejecting such persons from our society by revoking their citizenship (denaturalization) and/or by sending them from Canada (deportation), or by incarcerating them in Canadian jails — if and when they are found culpable after an expeditious, fair and impartial trial. The need for dispatch in these cases is manifest, otherwise justice delayed will most certainly result in justice denied.

The Canadian government, said present attorney general, Allan Rock (Globe & Mail July 10, 1996), "is committed to ensuring that justice is done and that our country does not become a safe haven for alleged war criminals." Similar statements were made by previous attorneys general such as Ray Hnatyshyn, under whom the special project to deal with suspected Nazi war criminals in Canada was established almost 10 years ago.

So what has been done to bring suspected Nazi war criminals and collaborators who are residing in Canada before the courts of justice? For purposes of analysis, we can divide the time from the end of World War II to the present into roughly five periods: 1945 to 1948; 1948 to 1985; Feb. 7, 1985 to Dec. 30, 1986; January 1987 to January 1995; and January 1995 to the present.

1945 to 1948: After the end of the World War II, an International Court at Nuremburg was established by the United States, England, France and Russia. Twenty-two major war criminals were charged. The Allies also established Allied central committees where trials were held by individual Allied countries with respect to crimes against their soldiers. Crimes against civilians were not normally part of these trials. Then, in July 1948, a secret memorandum from the United Kingdom was sent to Commonwealth countries that no more war crimes trials were to be held. Canada agreed. Thereafter, said the Deschênes Commission, in its report: "Whether by coincidence or by design, in the third of a century which followed, Canada devoted not the slightest energy to the search and prosecution of war criminals."

Justice Jules Deschênes

1948 to Feb. 7, 1985: After 1948, although there were occasional reports of alleged war criminals or collaborators living in Canada, no action was taken to investigate or pursue legal remedies against them for roughly 30 years! The Deschênes Commission described how from 1945 to 1962 the RCMP had no official policy respecting war crimes and from 1962 to 1982 frowned upon private complaints. In the early 1960s, pressure from the Jewish community in Canada to deal with two suspected Nazi war criminals was characterized as a "witch hunt." In 1966, the RCMP confirmed that 11 suspects identified by Simon Wiesenthal had been Canadian citizens since 1956 but no action was taken.

By the early 1970s, reports that Nazi war criminals and collaborators had been admitted into Canada in large numbers were increasingly appearing in the regular media. Estimates varied from a "handful" according to the Justice Department, to the 6,000 cited by Simon Wiesenthal. After 1983, estimates from non-governmental organizations never fell below 1,000. As a result of increasing criticism and cries for action, the suspected existence of war criminals became a major issue in the 1980s. The Government of Canada referred the matter to a Royal Commission of Inquiry chaired by Chief Justice Deschênes of Quebec by Order-in-Council approved Feb. 7, 1985. The commission conducted hearings across Canada.

Feb. 7, 1985 to Dec. 30, 1986: The Deschênes Commission delivered its report on Dec. 30, 1986, acknowledging that suspected Nazi war criminals were indeed in Canada. Part I was published and amounted to 900 pages; Part II was confidential. The commission recommended the further investigation of approximately 224 cases. With respect to the 20 other cases where it had recommended in Part II that steps be taken toward either denaturalization and deportation or criminal prosecution, it said that urgent attention should be given to implementing those recommendations.

In the public part of the report, the commission explained how it had put together from various sources a master list of 774 persons, an addendum of 38 additional names and a list of 71 German scientists. To each it assigned a number and provided, in the public part of the report, a brief summary of its investigations linked to each number.

A review of these summaries reveals a dependence upon what it characterized as "external checks," namely inquiries made at German archives that specialized in German nationals and membership of the German Nazi party, the German police and military organizations. Often the commission recommended closing a suspect's file if his name was not located in these archives. This approach may well have foreclosed further consideration of other war criminals or collaborators in Canada since, as the commission explained elsewhere in the public part of report, "a substantial proportion" of its master list was comprised of "Russians, Ukrainians or Balts." Persons of these nationalities, being Eastern European rather than German, might therefore not have been recorded in the German Archives upon which the commission relied, although they may have participated or collaborated in war crimes.

Contrary to previous legal views from various sources, Deschênes and his commission were of the opinion that legal action could indeed be taken against suspected Nazi perpetrators living in Canada. It recommended the following methods in order of preference: extradition; criminal prosecution in Canada after amending the Criminal Code; and denaturalization and deportation.

The third method has been used with great success in the United States. In the last 16 years, about 52 Nazi persecutors have had their citizenship removed and 44 have been deported. A further 300 people are under investigation. And in 1993, notwithstanding the fact that almost 50 years had elapsed, the Office of Special Investigations filed more cases that year than any other year in its history because the fall of the Soviet Union opened up archives that had been closed since World War II.

Jan. 1, 1987 to 1994: The Deschênes Commission had recommended in the public part of its report that the denaturalization and/or deportation option be adopted in 10 of the 20 cases it had identified in its confidential report for "urgent attention."

A special litigation unit was established within the Department of Justice in the Spring of 1987 under the leadership of Bill Hobson, who was at that time assistant deputy general of Canada (Criminal Law), and an investigation unit was organized within the RCMP. About six months later, the first two cases were launched in the courts — one following the criminal route and the other the path of denaturalization — namely, criminal charges against Imre Finta in December 1987 and denaturalization proceedings against Jacob Luitiens in January 1988. The next year, the third case was initiated against Michael Pawlawski (December 1989) and the following year, the fourth case against Stephen Reisteter (January 1990). Then about three years went by before the fifth case was initiated against Radan Grujicic (December 1992). Only the Luitjens and Finta cases actually went to trial. The charges against the other three were subsequently dropped or stayed by the court for reasons including ill health and the death of key witnesses or suspects.

October 1991, Luitjens had his citizenship revoked. His subsequent appeals were not successful and in November 1992, he was summarily deported to Holland where he faced a life sentence for collaboration with the Nazis. Upon arrival he was immediately placed in jail. After serving about 2½ years, he was released. Finta, on the other hand, was acquitted of all charges in May 1990 and the Crown's appeal to the Ontario Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court of Canada were unsuccessful.

Thus, of the five proceedings instituted in the six year period from the recommendations of the Deschênes Commission Report in December 1986 to the institution of proceedings against Grujicic in December 1992, only the denaturalization proceeding was successful. Not unexpectedly, a growing momentum advocating that more denaturalization proceedings be instituted was increasingly reflected in the media. By the end of 1993, public officials were reported in the media to the effect that further denaturalization proceedings could be instituted shortly.

On July 8, 1993, the Toronto Star reported that although a representative of the War Crimes Section had stated in December 1992 that by March 1994 action would be taken against as many as 20 alleged Nazi war criminals, the halfway mark had come and gone and no proceedings had as yet been initiated.

In December 1993 both the Toronto Star and the Ottawa Citizen reported that the War Crimes Unit was completing 18 priority investigations and expected to make recommendations regarding more denaturalization proceedings shortly.

In March 1994, the Supreme Court of Canada delivered its judgment upholding Finta's acquittal. Statements in the judgment appeared to uphold a defence that relied upon publicly stated beliefs that Jews were subversive and detrimental to the war effort in Hungary, and also the defence of following orders.

On Aug. 19, 1994, the Ottawa Citizen reported that the War Crimes Unit was on the verge of recommending denaturalization and/or deportation proceedings against eight suspected Nazi collaborators. Subsequent newspaper articles reported that eight cases had been sent to the minister of Citizenship and Immigration with recommendations to institute such proceedings.

On Aug. 25, 1994, The Canadian Jewish News reported that a war crimes spokesperson said it was expected that 20 cases and possibly more would eventually be forwarded to the Citizenship and Immigration Department for action.

Arnold Fradkin was one of the founding members of the War Crimes Litigation Unit in the Deprtment of Justice. The unit was formed in 1987 after the Deschênes Commission released its report on the existence of Nazi War criminals in Canada. He was lead counsel in the case against Jacob Luitjens.

Gush residents boast high quality of life

ISRAEL DIARY PART III

On stony hills of Judea south of Jerusalem, ancient terraces march down the hillsides where farmers created fields of precious earth sprouting olive trees and grape vines, fig trees and other fruit-bearing varieties.

By Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

During the War of Independence settlers of the Etzion Bloc held out against Arab armies for a long time. Finally the settlement was overrun, the surviving defenders taken prisoner to Jordan and the settlement uprooted. After 1967, the rebuilding of Gush Etzion began.

Today "the Gush" is comprised of many settlements such as Neve Danielle, Elazar, Bat Ayn, Carmei Tzur, Tekoah, Alon Shvut, and Kibbutzim Rosh Tzurim, Kfar Etzion, and Migdal Oz. A further 1,000 or more families live in Efrat.

Bumper stickers are the fastest way to test the political waters here. They read MAFDAL (the National Religious Party), or "Hebron now and forever" or "ze lo shalom chaver" based on the alternate sticker "Shalom Haver", quoting President Bill Clinton at Yitzhak Rabin's funeral.

We visited the Gush guided by a family living in one of the settlements. Their home is a lovely spacious one-family residence, built of golden stone, surrounded by a burgeoning garden and housing five energetic children. Aside from the sometimes vicious political debate over the fate of the settlements in the territories, what has daily life been like for them in the years they have lived there?

First of all, there is the incredible growth. In 1990, residents lived in ramshackle mobile homes affording little defence during the Gulf War. (My daughter spent the war with this family.) Today hundreds, maybe thousands of homes share hillside space with the ancient terraces. Settlements now are connected to Jerusalem by three roads: the old road through Bethlehem, a temporary road and the new road that will bypass Bethlehem entirely and allow travel from Hebron to Jerusalem with ease.

Second, security. Our friend went to Kiryat Arba early in the morning in a bus with bullet-proof windows and an army escort. His pistol, which so far he has never fired in defence, was stuck in his belt.

Every household head is required to do once monthly, three-hour night-time guard duty and once, every two months, a full day guard duty. The children travel to school on a bus with no special guard, but children from areas further away have a guard on each bus.

All cars are equipped with shatter-proof glass and most have a security hook-up attached to the army base that notifies drivers of road blocks or allows drivers to contact the army if they encounter trouble. Soldiers stationed along the route stop all cars entering or leaving the Green Line, which separates the pre-1967 Israel from the territories.

Children run free within the settlements. But you don't go hiking in the hills without a weapon (although when we explored a Byzantine winepress, we left the gun in the car). On Shabbat, teens walk from one settlement to another.

Gush settlers come in many guises. There are no black-coated Haredim here (they live in a separate settlement), but knitted kippahs abound. Rabbi Shlomo Riskin leads his flock through the still waters of a scrubbed-clean Efrat, the cleanest place I saw in Israel, with luxurious American-style living. The Gush itself tolerates a wide spectrum of practice. So why did our friends move here, past the Green Line in the danger zone?

"We visited friends here. It was quiet and peaceful and we felt drawn to the area. We had to come before the Absorption committee of the settlement. They had to see if we fitted them and we had to decide it was the right place for us. It had to be mutual," they said.

"Yes, the guns are here, but it's such a part of our lives we don't think about it."

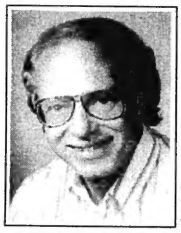
On the other hand, "the cemetery has very few old people in it. We've buried many good friends, young husbands, sons, and mothers and daughters who died in terrorist attacks.

"Certainly there was a feeling that we wanted to settle the land. But apart from that, the standards here are very high. Not just standards of education, but moral standards, a feeling of community. When we take our children for a walk, we can tell them that Abraham walked here. When they dig the foundations for a new house and find a winepress from the time of Abraham, you can feel the history around you. And our view reaches from Jordan to the Mediterranean Sea.

"We don't feel as if it is past the Green Line. We feel it is part of Eretz Israel."

'A High Modernist with Jewish humility'

Cynthia Ozick is the queen (and king!) of the parenthetical statement. One of the foremost writers of this or any other age, Ozick never takes the short or easy route as she examines life (sometimes her own), literature, Judaism, culture and history with a pen that can skewer, ascend, detour, plunge and vault — all in any given sentence.



By Shel Krakofsky in London, Ont.

In her third and newest essay collection, Fame & Folly (Knopf) when she writes about Henry James she declares, "The sacred terror is, in fact, the sensation — not simply fright, but a kind of revulsion — that comes when glimpse perilously lengthens into gaze."

Ozick can glimpse with insightful brevity or gaze with a lens that is both microscope and telescope. The language and ideas are panoramic, bold and breathless (and breath giving) in her essays, short fiction and novels. She is also a playwright and poet who has masterfully and lovingly translated works from Yiddish into English.

In Fame & Folly, she writes about such literary luminaries as Saul Bellow, T.S. Eliot, Henry James, Mark Twain, Salman Rushdie and Isaac Babel and about the constant conflict and skirmishes between life and art.

In Ozick's hands, this conflict is more meditation than mediation as she is unwilling to be handcuffed by T.S. Eliot's injunction about the objective correlative. When it has a literary purpose, Ozick injects herself into the fray as she does in the pieces, Alfred Chester's Wig and The Break even at the expense of self-deprecating irony.

As serious as she is, her distinctive humor is always hovering. In her essay on Isaac Babel, for example, she includes a sketch about her cousin who stayed with Ozick just before the breakup of the Soviet Union (a stay Ozick transformed into a New Yorker story): "At home she was a Sportsdoktor: she travelled with the Soviet teams, roughneck country boys and daily tested their urine for steroids. (Was this to make sure her athletes were properly dosed?)"

A stylist with an extraordinary range, these essays, like her others, are as informed, fluid, intricate, intense and delicious as the best of her fiction. She loves a good fight and is fearless about criticizing even those she admires for their misdeeds (T.S. Eliot and Salman Rushdie) or for their misreadings (Lionel Trilling and George Steiner).

Like A.M. Klein, she is passionate, unflinching and innovative in creating and maintaining Jewish culture in the English language. Without resorting to stereotypes, her artistic vision is expressed in and on Jewish terms. Born and living in the United States, Ozick has carried forward the weight and burden of Jewish scholarship, religion and history so it can enter the larger literary and cultural milieu.

Literary scholar and critic Michael Greenstein has called her, "a High Modernist with Jewish humility" and in the New York Times Book Review, Edmund White applauded in the past, "Precisely on account of her life, Miss Ozick strikes me as the best American writer to have emerged in recent years."

There are even Canadian connections in her novella, Puttermeser and Xanthippe, a modern and female version of the golem legend, one character is a professional fundraiser in Toronto and in the novel The Cannibal Galaxy, one individual moves to Hamilton and gets a job in an automotive garage.

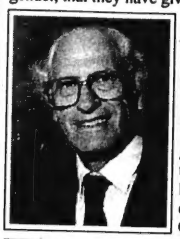
As English-speaking Jewish writers continue to exhibit fewer distinguishing characteristics, except for superficial vestiges of a Jewish past, this diluted culture has some critics predicting the end of any significant Jewish content in English letters. The majority of today's Jewish writers are unwilling and even worse, are incapable of acknowledging their Jewishness — or what's left of it — except with mere nods or sophomoric posturing.

Cynthia Ozick stands alone as the most gifted, knowledgeable and compelling Jewish writer of this generation. Remove the word Jewish and for this reader, the statement still holds. She is either the manifestation of a renewed Jewish literature in English-speaking diaspora or a solitary star marking the beginning of its end.

When it comes to survival and truth, like Cynthia Ozick, there is no in between or middle ground.

Understanding Quebec

A lot of people outside Quebec are so fed up with the recurrent problems the French province seems to engender, that they have given up and say, "Let them go. We won't have peace until they do." I do not belong to them; I value the unity of Canada as essential to fulfilling the great potential of the nation. But I have long supported the notion that Quebecers have a legitimate need that has to be met and that, unless it is done soon and willingly, Quebec will separate. In this respect I diverge from the opinion of most federalists. Many, if not most of them are worried about the effects of Quebec's secession on the rest of Canada. Of course that is a concern, but we will never reach a resolution of the conflict if we are worried about ourselves only, and not also about the underlying aspirations of the Québecois.



By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

It is my conviction that Canadians, and Jews especially, should understand that accommodation rather than threats will determine the shape of Canada, leading to a federated nation to which Quebec belongs, while exhibiting unmistakable aspects of cultural and social sovereignty.

To a significant degree I have been led to these conclusions because of my perception that the French factor resembles the Jewish factor in the population, in that both minorities have one essential need in common, which is to protect their own cultural inheritance. I spoke of this during my conversations with René Lévesque some twenty-five years ago, when I stressed that Jews know (or should know) what independence means to a people. To be sure, our histories differ radically, for the dream of Zion is unlike the desire of the Québecois to maintain their culture, but there is a convergence in that both peoples see sovereignty as the only viable solution. For two thousand years we Jews were a minority wherever we lived, and that status engendered bitter experiences whose elimination depended largely on others. The core group of French Quebecers are in this respect no different. They live as a small minority among more than 275 million English speakers in North America, and face the daily need of warding off the all-enveloping American presence.

Perception is a powerful shaper of reality. The separatists deem themselves to be shackled, while in fact they already have many of the trappings of independence. In those matters that will assure Quebec's cultural identity the province already is essentially sovereign – though absolute sovereignty is no longer possible for any people. The challenge therefore is to have both Quebec and the rest of us realize this fact. This understanding by a majority of Canadians would go a long way toward establishing a greater sense of mutual trust .

I am a staunch federalist and I believe with Stéphane Dion (who has the daunting task of keeping Canadians together) that the recognition of Quebec's distinct society is a necessary ingredient of Canadian unity.

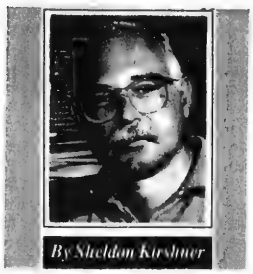
Bad Reichenhall revisited

The clerk in Bad Reichenhall's municipal building pulled out a ledger from a bookshelf, flipped through the pages



By Sheldon Kirshner

until he got to the letter K and, letting his forefinger guide him, reached my surname.

Within seconds, he found my birth certificate. It was a precious moment, though just another routine inquiry for him.

As I glanced at the almost indecipherable Gothic script, my thoughts turned to my parents, both of whom were born and raised in Lodz, Poland, and whom fate brought to Bad Reichenhall.

Genya, my mother, survived the deprivations of the Lodz ghetto and the horrors of Auschwitz, Bergen-Belsen, Dachau, Gross Rosen and Mauthausen.

David, my father, a soldier in the Polish army, was hit by shrapnel as the Wehrmacht advanced inexorably into Poland. After recovering from his wounds in a German hospital, he was sent back to Lodz. There, until the liquidation of the ghetto in August 1944, he was a forced laborer. Then, having no further use for him, the Nazis consigned him to the black hole of the concentration camp system.

When the war finally ended, he found himself in Bergen-Belsen, where he met my mother, whom he had known in Lodz. For the next few months, they wandered around Germany and Austria, looking for relatives and friends who may have survived the Holocaust.

They were married in 1945, in a displaced persons camp in Ainring, a drab village 12 kilometres north of Bad Reichenhall, an elegant spa in the Bavarian Alps where I was born about a year later.

At the invitation of the German National Tourist Office, Bad Reichenhall's tourism board and Lufthansa Airlines, I returned to Bad Reichenhall in November. Call it, if you will, a desire to plumb my roots. I made my way there from Frankfurt by plane and from Munich by train, a sentimental journey of about three hours

As I discovered, Bad Reichenhall is a neat and attractive town of 17,000 in the Chiemgau Valley. It lies 470 metres above sea level, in a peninsular pocket jutting into Austria.

It is in close proximity to Thumsee, a pint-sized lake with a walking path and a stunning view of misty snow-clad mountains; Salzburg, the home of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart; Berchtesgaden, which is indelibly linked with the Eagles' Nest, Adolf Hitler's posh mountain retreat in Obersalzberg; and Konigsee, a tranquil alpine lake whose mirror-like surface is often compared to Canada's Lake Louise.

Framed by the rugged outline of the crystalline Alps, Bad Reichenhall is a popular destination. Attracting more than one million tourists annually, it draws mountain climbers, nature buffs, skiers, ice skaters and curlers. Many of the visitors head for the Mount Predigtstuhl cable car, reportedly the oldest in Europe.

Sentimental journey to spa

With its squeaky clean sanitariums, it is virtually like one big health club. Walk into one, such as the Rupertusbad, and you see people taking the cure: reposing mummy-like in mud baths, submitting to body messages, lolling in Jacuzzis, exercising limbs in indoor and outdoor swimming pools.

The town's historic salt works, the Alte Saline – the source of the brine essential to the curative powers of its spas – is an atonal symphony of whirling machinery, clanging bells and gushing water.

Being neither a gambler nor a shopper, I did not visit Bad Reichenhall's casino or its stylish shops and boutiques. But I stopped in its glass factory, explored its sedate gardens and ruminated in its concert halls, which usually resound to orchestral classical music.

At the suggestion of my guide, Herta Maier, I dropped in at the renowned Cafe Reber, a Viennese-style coffee house that exudes a genuine gemutlichkeit ambience so typical of Germany. It was not far from my hotel, the Steingenberger Axelmannstein, which is under the stewardship of Klaus Kartmann, the former manager of Montreal's Chateau Champlain.

The Axelmannstein, said to be one of the finest hotels in the region, is within easy walking distance of a special address, 8 Maximilianstrasse.

There, in an appealing residential neighborhood, stands an ornate three-storey beige apartment building set off by white trim, balconies on each floor, a black cupola and a red tile roof. Called the Villa Luxenbourg, it is fenced in by a white wrought iron gate.

I was born in this building, once a hospital, exactly a day after my mother arrived from Ainring, whose undistinguished appearance is belied by the astonishing beauty of its alpine surroundings.

The DP camp in which my parents lived for 1½ years, before their departure by train and by ship to Canada, was in Mitterfelden, an appendage of Ainring.

The barracks they and about 5,000 other Jewish refugees were housed in adjoined a former German air force base, currently used by the Bavarian police.

Fredric Muller-Romminger, a local historian who resides in neighboring Schwarzbach, told me that the base was constructed in 1933 for Hitler's convenience when he was flying to his Eagles' Nest redoubt high in the Alps. In 1938, the base became a training centre for Luftwaffe pilots in the reserves. And two years later, it was converted into an aviation research institute.

On May 4, 1945, the facility was captured by the U.S. Third Army, and shortly afterward, it was turned into a camp for displaced persons like my parents.

Bad Reichenhall, as I learned from Muller-Romminger, emerged almost unscathed from the ravages of the war. But on April 25, 1945, it tasted its bitter fruits .

At 10:51 a.m. on that day, waves of B-24 Liberation bombers of the Eighth U.S. Air Force hit the train station off Wittelsbacherstrasse. It was strategically important because its rail line linked Munich with Vienna.

The raid claimed the lives of nearly 200 soldiers and civilians, some of whom were kilometres away from the station.

The planes also blasted neighboring Rosenheim and Traunstein, bombing factories judged to be vital to Germany's war machine. Before flying back to their bases, the aircraft homed in on the Eagles' Nest, obliterating Hitler's idyllic compound.

Today, Bad Reichenhall, a world-class resort, sparkles in the sun. It no longer bears the marks of war, the smoldering ruins of the Eighth Air Forces' bombing run having been removed decades ago.

But for my parents, who passed through Germany in the raw aftermath of the Holocaust, this small town evokes exceedingly ambivalent feelings.

Here, in the heart of a supposedly civilized continent, the scourge of Nazism festered. But here, in a verdant valley brimming with wild flowers under clear blue skies, their first child was born, signifying joy and hope for a better tomorrow.

Parents' integrity key to children's values

Countless confused parents are posing the bitter question – Why? – as they are confronted daily with a rising tide of impossible situations – all affecting the welfare, health and even the sanity of their children. Frustrated educators, social thinkers and national and religious leaders add their voices in the search for basic reasons for the lawlessness, violence, degradation and drug abuse afflicting us socially and morally.

Why? What has brought us to a state of affairs in which crimes of violence spread like wildfire in the midst of the most affluent society, in which crimes of every category against property, homes and possessions spiral daily. Having achieved supremacy in the technological world, man seems to have lost control of the basic rudiments of social and moral order. Finding a quick and healthy solution before society becomes unsalvageable is urgently necessary. Solutions, to be effective, must be based on the why, on the primary causes of our troubles.

I submit that one of the basic reasons for the state of our world is the growing disillusionment of our children with their parents. Parents are, after all, the very first rung in the ladder of "establishment." They are the very first dispensers of rules and regulations. When rebellion is the battle cry of the hour, parents are perforce the first victims. Before youth can destroy the establishment (the law-enforcement agencies, the schools and the judicial system), they must immobolize and destroy the effectiveness of the first symbol of authority – respect for parents.

But why are they so successful? Why do these children literally run away from parents who provide every comfort and pleasure imaginable for the privation and squalor of a sub-human existence?

Parents, intentionally or not, are the primary conveyors of honesty, decency and religion. If they expect to be effective teachers, should they not attempt to be living examples of virtue to their children?

What is more hollow and meaningless, indeed hypocritical, than parents who pronounce rules regarding children's conduct which are flagrantly flouted by the parents themselves? What value can a request to a sensitive boy or girl to pray on Shabbat, wear t'fillin or eat kosher have, when the one who is doing the asking is personally indifferent to these very precepts?

What pain and anguish must an innocent teenager feel when he discovers that the parents who exhort him to remain chaste and pure are guilty of practising double and triple standards of morality? How often do we hear of the shrewd businessperson who boasts of his/her skill in defrauding the government or customers? Can such a parent berate his/her child for any transgressions of the civil, political or moral code?

The Talmud relates that when a judge would tell a person to remove a toothpick from his teeth (refrain from a minor crime or infraction of the law), the accused would respond, "First remove the beam from

Israel's warrior diplomat

Living History*, by Chaim Herzog, (Random House, $42).

In 1983, Chaim Herzog was elected president of Israel, a position he held for 10 years. This was a popular and wise choice for he had served his country well as warrior, diplomat and statesman.

In his younger years, as an officer in the British Army during World War II, he helped to liberate German concentration camps and was one of the first Allied witnesses to Nazi atrocities. He relates in this absorbing, lucid and elegantly written memoir, that "for Germans to say, then or today, that they knew nothing of what had transpired — as nearly every German claimed — was a desperate lie ... the German people had to have known — the truth was ominpresent and inescapable." When he told some of the survivors that he was a Jewish officer from Palestine, they all burst into tears. Viewing the living, emaciated skeletons, "It was all that I could do to keep from doing the same."

In the tumultuous 1970s, he was appointed ambassador to the United Nations. It was a difficult and frustrating time when he seemed almost alone in his battle on behalf of Israel against a phalanx of opposing nations. He rejoices that "In December 1991, the U.N. resolution equating Zionism with racism was revoked by the General Assembly by a surprisingly large majority ... Sixteen years earlier, we had been subjected to attack, diatribe, condemnation and calumny. The world had changed considerably."

The author's exciting life paralleled almost all of the great and tragic events of Israeli history. He fought in many of its wars and his high position brought him into close contact with such personalities as Richard Nixon, Henry Kissinger, Margaret Thatcher and the royalty of many countries. He provides brief but telling portraits of these movers and shakers and has amusing anecdotes to relate about them.

Herzog is outspoken in his condemnation of the 1982 invasion of Lebanon. He writes that it was an unfortunate chapter in Israel's military history. "It cost many lives, diminished our self-confidence, wasted years which could have been devoted to developing the new peace with Egypt and, most serious of all, broke a heretofore national consensus on our ability to wage war and the moral basis for doing so."

The son of Israel's one-time chief rabbi deplores the extremism that in recent years has entered Israeli religious and social life. At a memorial service at the graveside of Yigal Allon, he castigated those who had attacked the kibbutzim as irreligious and removed from traditional Judaism. He said that the nation as a whole should go to the gravesides of the boys who had fallen and asked their forgiveness. "Men who had led our forces to victory were being labelled as traitors by those who had never heard the sound of war; underground leaders were being maligned by those who never knew what they did; and people who had served the nation were being vilified by those who had never done anything in their lives."

On the thorny questions of Palestinian independence and the status of Jerusalem, Herzog suggests that "facts must be faced: in all probability there will ultimately be a Palestinian state linked in the federation or confederation with Jordan." Jerusalem, he indicates will never be relinquished as Israel's capital, "But accommodation for the city's Moslem holy places (not to mention Christian sites) will have to be agreed upon ... once that is settled, a rational and likely solution is to set up a Palestinian capital in either Gaza or in Ramallah, just north of Jerusalem."

This passionate, autobiography by a wise, experienced and courageous leader ends with the plea for unity. Israel, he insists must deal with fundamentalism and extremism ... "If we cannot bring about peace within our borders, how can we expect to achieve it outside them? If we learned anything at all from Rabin's assassination, it is that reason and understanding must prevail over irrationality and fear."

Young people search for honesty

between your eyes." (What about the major crimes of which the judge is guilty?)

We parents and rabbis are the judges of our children – the guides and teachers, those who pass final judgment on them. The same yardstick that applied to our ancient judges must be applied to us as parents.

Youth is searching, almost begging, for a bit of honesty, sincerity and meaningful experiences to give them a sense of fulfilment and direction in life. The young people who "turn off" and "cop out" are not really stupid or crazy; some are quite intelligent and even brilliant. They are using their familiar "show and tell" to proclaim their complete disgust with the prevailing false values.

Their bitterness and rebellion are directed against parents, because in their children's eyes, parents bear a major share of the guilt for the unhappy world situation, for the corruption of the leaders of government and society, if not for approving and being part of the hypocrisy, than for their silence in the face of all the wrongs. By their long hair, their strange clothes, their drugs, and their earrings, these unfortunate youngsters honestly believe they will pierce the armor of self-righteousness of the establishment.

I see but one course for humanity: parents must face reality. They must take stock of their spiritual and moral values. To draw their children back to reality, parents must be the fountainheads of integrity. They must practise what they preach and erase double standards from their conduct in business, religion and social relationships. There must be a wholehearted return to our Father in Heaven, with a commitment to real Torah observance, and in turn the Almighty will surely repay by returning your children to you.

Internet a vast repository of summer programs in Israel

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Winter is barely a week old and the days are still dark and gloomy, so what better time to think about...summer. If you are a high school or university student looking for a summer program in Israel, then start your hunt on the Jewish Highway. Today, we'll look at programs where you can hone your Hebrew, live the kibbutz experience, rediscover Judaism and dig back thousands of years into Jewish history.

Probably the granddaddy of all Israel programs is summer on kibbutz. To see what is available take a look at the Kibbutz Programs Centre's Summer Program page [http://www.webflex.com/kibbutz/page9.htm].

The various programs range from three to eight weeks in length and emphasize sightseeing, Hebrew studies or just plain hard work. You can find links to other kibbutzim at [http://www.maven.co.il/subjects/idx150.htm].

If you were intrigued after reading James Michener's The Source or inspired by the work done by Yigal Yadin at Masada, then you may want to spend the summer at an archeological dig. The Israel Foreign Ministry has prepared a comprehensive Web site at [http://www.israel-mfa.gov.il/archdigs.html]. You'll find information about the main season for excavations, previous experience needed and the hours (long.)

If work on a dig isn't for you, then maybe you should be a Volunteer for Israel [http://members.aol.com/vol4israel/index.html]. This organization will place you at an IDF army base filling duffel bags, washing dishes or building bunkers. At a hospital, you might deliver meals or transport and feed patients. Or maybe you'll even find yourself transplanting seedlings and saplings at the Jerusalem Botanical Gardens.

If you want to stimulate your mind and soul this summer, there are many yeshivot and other educational institutions that offer courses guaranteed to give you a good workout. Many organizations such as Ohr Somayach International [http://virtual.co.il/education/education/ohr/web/jle/geninfo.htm], Aish Hatorah [http://www.aish.edu/index.htm#Vacation] and Neve Yerushalayim College [http://www.torah.org/neve/] offer summer programs. You can find links to other yeshivot at [http://www.maven.co.il/subjects/yeshivot.htm] and [http://www.virtual.co.il/education/education/6.htm].

Halfway between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, the Gezer Seminar Centre offers a series of stimulating programs [http://www.gezer-net.co.il/seminarcenter.html]. The centre, located on Kibbutz Gezer, offers groups programs which explore such thought-provoking topics as Who is a Jew, Kibbutz in Crisis, Jewish State in an Arab World and Eco-Zionism. If you shy away from controversy, there are always courses on pita baking and storytelling.

Also worth a look is Livnot U'Lehibanot — To Build, and to Be Built [http://www.virtual.co.il/education/livnot]. These three-week and three-month programs based in Jerusalem and Tzvat are offered "to English-speaking Jews committed to sharing an intense group experience while cultivating personal growth."

Still searching? Then don't miss The Israel Experience [http://www.teenisrael.org]. This massive site acts as a clearing house for over 130 North American organizations that run youth programs in Israel, many in association with Israel's Youth and Hechalutz Department [http://www.youth.org.il].

Canadian helps special needs kids in Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Canadian woman living on an Israeli moshav just north of Tel Aviv has turned a room of her home into a central clearing house to help parents of children with special needs.

Toronto-born Audrey Jagoda (known in Israel as Chaya) is the mother of four grown children, two of whom were born with fragile x syndrome, a genetic condition associated with mental retardation.

Her 2-year-old organization, known by the Hebrew acronym Tzachi (Tzachanei Chinuch Yechudi, or customers of special education) brings together parents representing about 20 special interest organizations.

Its main goal is to help parents get the best education for each child, including the physically handicapped and the gifted, Jagoda said.

With the exception of a two-year stint in Toronto in the 1970s, Jagoda (née Mandell) and her sabra husband have lived in Israel for the past 33 years.

Ilan, their oldest son, is considered high functioning. He works in a small hardware store on the moshav and enjoys contact with "regular people."

As a child, he had attended a special education school in Israel, but on moving to Toronto, he was placed in a special class within a regular public elementary school, Jagoda recalled during a recent visit.

When they returned to Israel, Ilan refused to go to his former school. Although his mother fought to have him placed within a regular school, at the time "it just wasn't done," she said.

Over the years, more options have become available in Israel for kids with special needs, and Jagoda has been involved in a number of the changes.

Although her youngest child finished school two years ago, Jagoda felt she still had much to offer younger parents of children with special needs, and they encouraged her to remain involved.

Jagoda was among a group of parents who successfully lobbied for Israeli law reform in the 1980s so that all education-related needs would come under one authority. They were also instrumental in having parents become involved on placement committees.

"My job was to find parents all over the country," said Jagoda. "There are over 200 placement committees in Israel."

Jagoda was also active in advocating that the system give credence to parental expertise. "You have to listen to the parent."

If parents insist that their child be placed in a regular classroom setting, perhaps with extra support, 30 to 50 percent will be proven right if given the opportunity, Jagoda said. The rest will find it easier to accept their child's limitations and move on, she added.

Although Jagoda's son Ilan had no such options and her third child, Oren, was "fine" in a school for the mentally retarded, Jagoda has worked to ensure that children today have more options.

While recent budget cuts within the public education system in Israel have caused some concerns, Jagoda noted that physically handicapped children are being well served. She is not convinced, however, that plans to integrate an increasing number of kids with special needs into regular classes is the optimum solution.

In the past few years, a number of new private schools for children with hyperactivity or dyslexia or other learning disabilities have opened in Israel, Jagoda said.

With contacts across the country, she gets about four phone calls a day from parents seeking schools, programs or organizations for their children

Jagoda can be reached at Tzachi, P.O. Box 80, Moshav Udim, Israel 42905, by e-mail at [avir__rom@netvision.net.il], or by phone at 011-972-9-8655203.

Books on Jewish surnames honor Chinsky's memory

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two volumes on the history of Jewish surnames in Poland and Russia were presented to the Jewish Public Library recently by the Savoy Club to honor the memory of Joe Chinsky, an active volunteer for many community agencies.

"He will have a share in the world to come because he knew how to make people laugh," said Rabbi Zigmund Wolkenstein in accepting the two large volumes for the library's shelves, where they will be available to the public.

The Savoy Club is comprised of Jewish men who were involved in the Jewish Boys Club and other social groups in the 1930s, many of whom served in World War II overseas, as Chinsky did in the RCAF.

"He didn't have an enemy in the world and in this day and age that's saying quite a bit," said Bill Stern, a Savoy Cub member, who along with Solly Cantor, organized the event.

In accepting a special plaque from the Savoy Club, Miriam Chinsky, his wife, a writer for The CJN, said the volumes were a fitting memorial for her late husband, whose second home was a neighborhood public library in Cabbagetown, where he grew up.

Among those attending were three of Chinsky's sisters, Rene Shapiro, Dorothy Teplinsky and Vivian Hornfeld.

Disability fails to stop Boles from helping others

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — When a touch football accident in 1967 left Lewis Boles paralyzed below the shoulders, he was determined that his disability would not prevent him from enjoying life.

"My parents made me realize that there is more to life than moping. They encouraged me to look beyond my limitations and reach my potential," he says.

Boles, 47, recently received one of seven awards given by the Clarke Institute of Psychiatry Foundation at its fourth annual Courage to Come Back dinner. The awards honor individuals throughout Ontario who have triumphed over illness, injury or addiction and have used the experience gained during their recovery to help others in the community.

Two years after his accident, Boles, previously a pre-med student, returned to university to study computer science and computers. In 1980, he worked with students at Queen's University and with technicians at Kingston General Hospital to develop programming for personal computers to help improve the lives of people with disabilities.

"I owed a lot to the community and knew that there were many people with disabilities or limitations who could benefit from my knowledge and skill," he says. "I wanted others to develop their potential."

Now a resident of Queen Elizabeth Hospital, Boles works part-time as a computer programmer in an office partly furnished by his employer and set up in the hospital. The rest of his time is spent helping individuals and groups use current and emerging technologies to enhance the quality of their lives.

"I want to continue to help people with disabilities gain independence, choice and control so they can make their own decisions and decide their own directions," Boles says.

A pet project is his work on the Shared Accommodations committee which is studying the possibility of moving some of the hospital's residents to homes in a co-op community specially designed for people with disabilities.

"Queen Elizabeth has tentatively offered us a house and we are now planning the necessary renovations in order to make the house accessible," he says.

"Chronic care is changing. People with disabilities would like to be out in the community where there is more choice in their lifestyle. I know it is a risk to leave the hospital, but it is a responsible risk."

At the hospital, Boles has served on the personal computers for patients committee and the quality improvement initiative committee. He is also past president and treasurer of the patients council. As well, he has advised the Toronto public library on adaptive technology to improve access for people with disabilities and serves on the Interface Advisory Committee Panel, made up of a group of consumers who advise Bloorview MacMillan Hospital on policies, procedures and future directions.

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Mel Kirzner was recently bar mitzvahed at the age of 54, it was another example of the cooperation and good feeling that exists between a synagogue and L'Arche Daybreak, a Christian community that is open to people of all faiths with disabilities.

"We feel privileged when Mel and others join our services, we get more from them than we give," said Gary Farb, chair of Kehillat Ahavat Hesed, an egalitarian congregation that meets in rented quarters on Marlee Avenue.

Kirzner lives in one of the 11 homes in Toronto and Richmond Hill run by Daybreak, a community founded by Jean Vanier, son of a former governor general of Canada.

She was there along with Mel's family, some of whom had come from Vancouver, when he was called before the Torah and recited the brachot.

The first one to rush up and hug him exclaiming, "You did it, Mel," was his friend Ellen Weinstein, a resident of the Richmond Hill L'Arche house, who celebrated her bat mitzvah in the same synagogue two years earlier. It was Ellen's father, Harold, who, along with members of Kehillat, was one of Mel's coaches. For more than a year, they used tapes to prepare him for the ceremony.

Dr. Leba Lesk, a member of the shul, said Ellen often opens the ark at services.

"When Mel was 13 I knew a bar mitzvah was not a possibility," said his father, Ben, 81. "When I first heard about this, it was beyond me, something I never expected."

When he first went to Daybreak 23 years ago, after the death of his mother, Kirzner was in a shell, his father said. "But at Daybreak he started to talk."

"Mel is an incredible guy," said Bernie Farber, a Canadian Jewish Congress officer, who knew him from his social worker days in Ottawa. "When I first met him again in Toronto he could recall in the most fascinating detail little events that brought us together."

Though legally blind, Mel is able to negotiate the subway, memorizing the order of the stops and travels from his East York home to his work at the Daily Harvest Food Bank.

'Mel's an incredible guy'

"It was Mel who decided on his own that he wanted a bar mitzvah," said Beth Porter, chair of Daybreak's ecumenical and interfaith committee, who often attends services at Kehillat Ahavat Hesed on her own or with members of the L'Arche community. She is a member of the Holocaust Remembrance Committee of Christian-Jewish Dialogue.

Mazon Canada reports record in '96

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Perhaps it was the Cranbrook Food Bank Society in British Columbia. Maybe it was the Jewish Family Services agency in Calgary. Or perhaps its was one of 86 other recipient organizations that helped Mazon Canada reach a historic milestone when its total allocations since 1987 reached the $1 million mark.

Mazon Canada distributed $228,980 in 1996, its best year ever and $74,330 more than its previous high water mark in 1995.

For most organizations, increased figures herald good times and feelings of satisfaction, but in the case of Mazon Canada, it's an indication of greater need and hunger across Canada.

"We're getting more organizations calling and more organizations that are desperate," said Lori Burke, Mazon's executive director.

Some food banks that have seen their government funding dry up completely have been forced to seek other sources of income, she said. She pointed to the Victoria Park Breakfast Club in Toronto as an example of an organization that approached Mazon Canada for the first time, with "a desperate plea." Victoria Park received $4,000 in 1996 from Mazon Canada.

Although Mazon Canada has experienced a steady growth in allocations every year, it saw a jump of approximately 50 percent in its fall 1996 allocation, from $70,050 in 1995 to $138,500 in 1996.

Burke said much of that is attributable to money raised at kosher food fests in Montreal in the last two years, with some of the funds raised in 1995 finally allocated in '96. In addition, Mazon Canada has received larger donations during its High Holy Day drive and its donor base across Canada has increased.

Described as "a Jewish response to hunger," Mazon Canada raises funds through voluntary contributions and distributes them twice yearly to grassroots organizations like food banks. The funds are allocated to a variety of groups across Canada on a non-denominational basis. Tomchai Shabbos in Toronto received the largest single amount, $4,500, while $500 was the smallest contribution.

Mazon Canada employs a number of fundraising techniques, including solicitation through synagogues and sale of place cards and greeting cards.

Professor describes control of matter with lasers

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

Paul Brum

TORONTO — How does one get nature to do what you want it to do instead of what it wants to do?

That was the question posed by Paul Brumer, University of Toronto chemistry professor and project leader of the Ontario Laser and Lightwave Research Centre, at the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science's recent national and Toronto chapter annual meeting held at the Sutton Place Hotel.

Brumer, who received his PhD in Chemical Physics at Harvard University, spoke on Controlling Matter with Lasers: A Major New Technology for the 21st Century.

Brumer has a long association with the Weizmann Institute in Rehovot, where he has spent a total of 2½ years over the past 24 years. During that time he has collaborated on an ongoing basis with the institute's Prof. Moshe Shapiro of the Chemical Physics department.

In his keynote speech, Brumer explained that the "matter" referred to in the title is "comprised of molecules and atoms. There are a billion billion trillion atoms in each little piece of material."

More importantly, he added, matter can undergo chemical change, in which it breaks apart into different pieces. "A commonplace situation is that one of the things is something you want, and one is something you don't, so it's been chemistry's goal forever to make more of what you want and less of what you don't want."

There now exists an effective means of controlling molecular motion with lasers, said Brumer. Proposed technological directions have implications in the pharmaceutical industry, the communications industry and in the production of fine chemicals. "It creates a myriad of applications," he said.

Teacher stresses importance of healthy eating habits

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Nancy Weisbrod teaches her students and her family to take responsibility for their own health.

A mother of five, Weisbrod has come up with the concept of Cooking for the Here and Now — Healthy Alternatives for the Whole Family.

"I look at health as not only physical but emotional and spiritual and the kind of cooking I practise and teach satisfies those needs," says Weisbrod.

With emphasis on high-fibre foods, she stresses the value of vegetarianism, although she does include a small amount of meat in her family's diet.

"On the emotional level, you are working with earthy, sensual ingredients that look beautiful when presented and you get the added bonus of knowing that you are preparing healthy meals," she says.

Spiritually, she adds, you are relating to a diet that your ancestors subsisted on. "Grains and beans are ancient and they are mentioned in the Torah."

On the physical level, she notes, you don't have to look further than what numerous nutritionists are telling us.

"Beans and grains have almost no fat and they are a high quality of protein when eaten together." This mutual supplementation or complementary proteins theory is seen in every culture with variations, she says. One example is the Jewish tradition of making kasha with bows.

Weisbrod, who received her bachelor of education at York University, graduated from the Cordon Bleu Cookery School in England and took a nutrition course through the University of Guelph. She taught at the Leo Baeck Day School and gave cooking classes in several community programs.

She owned and operated a catering business and created recipes and new food items for a number of companies.

Actively involved in the community, Weisbrod completed a Leadership Development Program at the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and she is a founding president of the Village Shul and Learning Centre.

Over the past few years, a number of Weisbrod's friends have expressed concerns about their diet and come to her for advice.

"They were looking not only for a change in diet, but a change in the whole concept of what it means to nourish. If we must eat, then let's learn to eat in order to fulfil ourselves and our loved ones."

When her friends asked her to teach them her method of cooking and meal planning, she created classes that emphasize interesting, nutritious, meatless dishes.

"Many people feel intimidated about vegetarian meals, but many of our parents were brought up on kasha and millet. I am bringing it into the '90s," she says.

Weisbrod refers to the Canada Food Guide, which she says is a pyramid that has grain as the base, followed by beans, vegetables and fruits, with dairy products, meat, eggs, fish and nuts in small quantities.

"There is a marketing problem with healthy eating," she says. "We must change our habits. We must learn to enjoy the taste."

Working from her home, Weisbrod believes in small classes and a hands-on approach to meal preparation.

"You have to work with the ingredients. Your kitchen should be your laboratory, for that's where you develop your good health habits."

CJC explores use of civil courts in war crimes

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) might use the civil courts against alleged Nazi war criminals in Canada, if Ottawa doesn't show more resolve to pursue them, according to CJC spokespersons.

The warning came after U.S. private investigator Steven Rambam met with CJC and RCMP officials here. Rambam handed over to them six audio tapes that he said constitute hard evidence of confessed participation in atrocities against Jews.

One of the tapes, played later that evening to an audience of 500 at the Beth Israel Beth Aaron Synagogue that included many Holocaust survivors, contains an admission by Antanas Kenstavicius of British Columbia that he helped round up 6,000 Jews in Lithuania before they were put in a pit and shot.

Kenstavicius, who is now 90 and lives in Hope, B.C., is facing a deportation hearing this month. CJC first gave the Canadian government information on him in 1949.

"If the RCMP and the Justice Department don't do something, we will go civilly," said CJC national community relations director Bernie Farber at a press conference earlier in the day.

Rambam, 39, added a warning at the synagogue: if the Canadian government does not act by March on his tapes, which the RCMP promised to analyse, he would publicly reveal all the names of the 60 suspected Nazi war criminals he surreptitiously taped over a two-year period in Canada, as was reported in a major story in the Nov. 22 Jerusalem Post.

Rambam said these 60 men admitted to him that they were members of units who murdered Jews. Seven of them told him they had personally killed Jews.

He said about 20 of his interviews (Rambam had 157 names in all supplied by the Simon Wiesenthal Centre's Israel office) took place in Montreal.

Speaking to reporters including producers from 60 Minutes and later at the synagogue, Rambam said he was sure he would have to expose the names, since he saw no sign that Canada yet had the "political will" or the moral backbone to act.

He was furious that Paul Vickery and Jean Dubé, respective heads of the federal government's and the RCMP's war crimes units, did not personally come to Congress to accept the tapes, as they had promised.

Irving Abella, a former CJC president who now chairs its war crimes committee, however, seemed more hopeful.

"I'm more sanguine," he said. "We hope Steve Rambam's information will embarrass the government into action," he said, "and put a little fire in their belly."

Rambam, as well, was critical of the Jewish community for not galvanizing itself into action.

"No one will do anything for the Jews but the Jews," Rambam told the synagogue audience. "If you don't do something, all these people will escape justice."

According to Rambam, Canada is harboring anywhere from 2,000 to 3,000 Nazi war criminals, 90 percent of them in the Toronto and Montreal areas.

Although Rambam told The CJN that Jewish organizations in Canada could have adopted his tactics 20 years ago, he also praised CJC for providing him with its "unequivocal support."

Rambam was accompanied during the day by the two Post reporters who broke the story – Steve Leibowitz and expatriot Montrealer Robert Sarner – and by the director of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre's Israeli office, Efraim Zuroff.

Jewish studies program

By WENDY SCHNEIDER
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — McMaster University has created a formula that will allow undergraduates to minor in Jewish studies, despite the absence of a formal department.

Prof. Adele Reinhartz, associate professor in the Department of Religious Studies, credits university president Peter George with developing the concept and arranging to have it implemented.

Until now, students with an interest in Jewish studies have been able to take courses only in the university's religious studies department. But with the minor program in Jewish studies, they will be able to choose courses from several other departments as well.

According to Reinhartz, the formula is a perfect way to capitalize on the university's strengths, as "it involves new things as well as drawing on what we've already been doing."

Another initiative recently put in place at the university provides an opportunity for graduate students and faculty to increase their knowledge of Jewish subjects.

Faculty members and graduate students from various departments have formed a monthly, informal study group on topics of Jewish interest, where a research paper is presented at each meeting by one of the participants.

Teens' drama festival entry focuses on Holocaust

By MOURA WOLPERT
Hamilton Correspondent

DUNDAS, Ont. — Everyone Has a Name, a play about the Holocaust by two Dundas high school students, will be their school's entry in the Sear's High School Drama Festival in February.

Alana Vertlieb, who is Jewish, and Niduk Nijayasingha, from Sri Lanka, are both 17 and in Grade 12 at Parkside High School. Both had attended seminars on the Holocaust, as well as the drama classes of Emilio del Sordo, who has been teaching a course on the Holocaust for some years. Still, both felt that not enough was being taught about it at school.

"We did a lot of reading and heard stories," they told The CJN prior to a recent rehearsal. Polish-born survivor Saul Cohen, a friend of the Vertlieb family, had spoken to the students about his experiences.

The two students began writing the play last February, but it wasn't until Vertlieb returned from the March of the Living trip to Poland and Israel a couple of months later that they proceeded in earnest.

"I felt I really wanted to do something," Vertlieb said. Not just speak to Jewish groups, she said, "but something that was different."

The best way she could express her feelings, she said, was through a play. Also, she added, a play would reach a wider non-Jewish audience.

Vertlieb and Nijayasingha finished the play in October. They did everything themselves – auditioned the cast, produced the play and directed it. As del Sordo pointed out, "they created this entirely by themselves."

The central character of Everyone Has a Name is a survivor who recalls scenes from her happy childhood and contrasts them sharply with recollections from Auschwitz. The part is played by Grade 10 student Samantha Waxman, who is 15 years old. Her rendition of a song entitled Zayde, from the March of the Living song book, ending with the poignant line "Who will be the Zayde for my children?" is especially moving.

The cast of 20 is impressive and obviously serious about conveying the message of the Holocaust. Original photographs from the era and some by Vertlieb from the March of the Living will be shown on screens on either side of the stage.

The 30-minute play, which ends on a note of hope, lends itself to school productions. Israel fellowships available

ALBANY, N.Y. — Applications are now available for the 1997 Bronfman Youth Fellowship in Israel.

The fellowships, now in their 11th year, offer an opportunity for 26 students entering Grade 12 to spend five weeks in Israel this summer. Fellows will be chosen on the basis of character, intellectual interests, special talents and leadership qualities. Merit, not financial need, is the standard for selection.

While living in Jerusalem, the Bronfman fellows participate in seminars and dialogues with the rabbinic faculty, explore Jewish texts against the background of Israel's land, culture and customs; and meet with some of Israel's prominent political and literary figures.

The Bronfman Youth Fellowship in Israel, a program of the Samuel Bronfman Foundation, Inc., begins on June 30, with a two-day seminar in New York City. The students return from Israel on Aug. 5.

Completed applications must be postmarked no later than Jan. 31. Finalists will be notified March 2 and finalist interviews will be held during the week of March 16. Names of the 1997 fellowship recipients will be announced on March 31.

High school students who will be in Grade 12 in the fall of 1997, may obtain application forms and information at the Bronfman Youth Fellowships in Israel, 17 Wilbur St., Albany, N.Y., 12202; telephone: 518-465-6575; fax: 518-432-8984; e-mail:[YFI@MCIMAIL.COM].

Gutkin leaves historical society

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — After nearly 30 years of involvement in the Jewish Historical Society of Western Canada and 19 years as its president, Harry Gutkin has stepped down to make room "for new actors with fresh ideas."

"It was time to get off the stage," he says. "It was a good time to leave while the organization is at its height. Ours is Canada's major Jewish historical society. Through our exhibits, collections and books published, the Jewish Historical Society of Western Canada has become known nationally and internationally."

The new president is not exactly a new face. Social historian Roz Usiskin has been a vital part of the organization for almost 20 years.

"We were faced with a leadership vacuum," she says. "There are few other people who have been around long enough to know the history of the JHS. I felt obligated to take this on."

The most immediate order of business for Usiskin will be managing the JHS' move into the new Jewish Museum of Western Canada which is opening with the Asper Jewish Community Campus next September. She describes the museum as unique in Canada.

"We also want to strengthen our relationship with the other Jewish historical societies in Western Canada," she says, "and we are preparing for our 30th anniversary in 1998."

As for Gutkin, he will continue to serve the society in an advisory capacity. He and his wife, Mildred, a former professor of English at the University of Manitoba, have a new book coming out in the spring. The 400-page Profiles In Dissent: The Shaping of Radical thought in the West is being published by NeWest Press. It was five years in the research and writing.

WJCC honors young leaders

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJCC) Young Leadership Awards have special meaning for 1995/96 recipients Faith Kaplan and Jonathon Kroft.

Kroft, who won the Harry Silverberg Award, says his family had a close relationship with the Silverbergs, while Kaplan's Max Nathanson Award was named after her great-uncle.

The awards are given to those who have demonstrated leadership qualities within the community and have devoted time and energy to the WJCC or its beneficiaries.

Kaplan is vice-president of the Combined Jewish Appeal Women's Campaign and has served in several other capacities within CJA. She has also been a board member of the Jewish Historical Society and the local chapter of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University.

Kroft, a lawyer, is senior vice-president of the WJCC and a member of the CJA cabinet. He is also on the national executive of Canadian Jewish Congress. He is a past-chair of the Manitoba branch of the Canada-Israel Committee.

Kaplan and Kroft, along with other Young Leadership Award recipients from around North America, attended the recent General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations in Seattle.

Both say they are honored and delighted to be recognized with the Young Leadership Awards. "There is still a lot of work to be done," says Kroft.

Netanyahu's long journey to Oslo

By DAVID MAKOVSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

Analysis

In his meetings with Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres, Arafat was fond of talking about the array of opposition forces he faced at home. During their 3½-hour meeting this week, Netanyahu candidly spoke about his own problems within his Likud coalition. He even told Arafat about his own brother-in-law, Hagi Ben-Artzi, who moved to Hebron as a sign of protest against the premier's support for the impending Hebron pullback deal.

Confiding in Arafat and lamenting about his own domestic problems certainly seems unimaginable for someone who earlier this year was denouncing Arafat as a "master terrorist," and who pledged never to meet him. Indeed, with the endless Hebron talks appearing to be on the verge of completion, it now seems evident that Netanyahu has travelled some distance on his own personal journey to Oslo, travelling by way of Hebron. Some officials believe he has done this because he realizes how much is at stake.

One way to look at the Hebron deal is to compare specific components of this deal and contrast it to the one reached by the Labor government. The fair question then becomes whether the differences are great enough to warrant a loss of a half-year and Israel's standing in the region. Such a comparative debate is legitimate. A senior Clinton administration official has put it this way: "Undoubtedly, the longer the delays, the more the costs went up."

However, the significance of a Hebron deal must also be analyzed beyond the contents of the deal itself, namely what it means for Netanyahu and the Likud. Specifically, this marks the first deal between enemies, the Likud and the PLO. No less critically, it signifies the Likud's first territorial concession in the West Bank. Moreover, it is occurring in the one city in the West Bank which resonates with biblical meaning. It also marks Netanyahu's affirmation of the entire Oslo framework — the same Oslo which the Likud railed so bitterly against while in opposition.

In view of these factors, cabinet confusion about this issue is understandable, since the Likud has never sorted out how its old ideas will mesh with the new reality of a post-Oslo world.

Since it is such a departure from the past, one can see that this agreement marks Netanyahu's "on-the-job" training. While one could legitimately ask whether it should occur at the state's expense, the fact is that, as opposed to Uri Savir, Labor's chief negotiator with the Palestinians from the 1993 secret talks in Norway until the middle of this year, who said that he tallied some 3,000 hours of meetings with Palestinian interlocutors, Netanyahu did not know any of the PLO leadership before taking office, and perhaps knew hardly any Palestinians at all. Hence, there was bound to be a learning curve which may not yet be complete, especially since the Likud has held more of an ideological bias against the PLO than Labor did.

Palestinian official Mahmoud Abbas (known by the patronym Abu Mazen) summed up the difficulties of these negotiations when he said recently: "Of course it is harder. We are now trying to make peace with the other part of Israel," which did not back Oslo.

As for settlement expansion, one Netanyahu adviser said, "We don't win when we talk about settlements and ideological issues, but rather when we talk about security."

It is important, he added, that National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon, who is leading the cabinet fight against a Hebron deal, is seeking to win adherents among his colleagues by making his argument on security rather than ideological grounds.

Settlers have also abandoned the ideological argument, realizing their only chance to win over the public is to speak in terms of personal safety.

Alluding to the Camp David accords, President Ezer Weizman suggested this week that the transition to pragmatism is not simple. "This is not easy for Netanyahu. When I was defence minister, I saw Menachem Begin undergo the same process."

One U.S. official seemed to reflect the view of many when he said he believes that Netanyahu has swung towards a Hebron deal because too much is at stake for Israel. "He's in the big league now," the official said of Netanyahu. "You can be an ideologue in the opposition. But when you are a prime minister, you have to adjust your ideological underpinnings. The world is putting tremendous stock in these talks. You cannot ignore this reality without a paying price in Israel's standing."

Indeed, the world is watching. Israel has much more to lose today than it did in the early '90s. In the wake of Oslo, it now has relations with a good portion of the Arab world, and therefore the risk of isolation and deterioration with unexpected consequences is much more evident. Israel's dependence upon the Pentagon is such that the chill in relations that would follow a halt in the peace process would adversely affect those crucial and increasingly intricate ties.

In addition to Israel's relations with the United States and the Arab world, there is a third set of pressures, neither foreign-related nor economic, but unstated. Specifically, in contradiction to what he believed when in opposition, Netanyahu now seems to believe that halting the peace process won't halt violence, but accelerate it. This is a crucial point.

It seems clear that these three sets of pressures that have brought Netanyahu to where he is now will be accompanying him throughout the rest of the peace process.

Critically, this does not mean that one should expect Netanyahu to always yield. On the contrary, no government can be expected to point out when Israel's vital interests are at risk, such as on issues of tanks, airspace and water.

Yet, short of those situations, having responsibility for a country – as opposed to hectoring from Knesset rostrums in the opposition – means that Netanyahu is finding out that he has to look at the broader picture instead of just the feelings of people closest to him. Vital interests rather than ideology, have brought a reluctant Netanyahu to accept Oslo.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our third annual Purim Art Contest. We are asking students in elementary schools to submit drawings about Purim.

Who can enter: Children from grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on March 20. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small. Please paint, draw or color bright, bold, colorful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. And you can even give them a title.
Please send us your name, address, phone number, school and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Rd., Suite 205, North York, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, March 3, 1997.

We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen for publication as "winners". The judges will base their decision on a number of factors such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 7, 1997.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 20, 1997. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Professor calls on rabbis to back political tolerance

By LEORA EREN FRUCHT
Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — In November 1995, Prof. Nissan Rubin published an anguished letter, holding the national religious camp partly responsible for the murder of Yitzhak Rabin. The observant Bar-Ilan University sociologist had hoped the open letter — written together with colleague, Prof. Menachem Friedman — would set off a bout of soul-searching in his own camp. But today Rubin is disappointed.

"I had hoped the murder would bring about deep change in the national religious camp. But the conditions for breeding fanaticism are still there.

"The danger of another political assassination exists," he says, noting the measures taken to protect Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. "I don't want to believe that it can happen. But I can't rule out that there are other Amirs and Goldsteins out there," he says, referring to Rabin's assassin, Yigal Amir and to Baruch Goldstein, who killed 29 Moslem worshippers in Hebron in 1994.

"Rabin's murder was a great shock for many in the religious community. But I don't know if any practical conclusions were drawn from it, particularly in the vital area of education."

In a recent interview with The CJN, Rubin blamed the religious educational system in Israel for producing youth with militant views. "Of course, religious education doesn't justify murder," Rubin noted. But he criticized the school system for discouraging pluralism, blurring the distinction between religion and politics, and engaging in political indoctrination of students. He cited state religious schools, yeshivot and ulpanot (Jewish seminaries for girls) and religious youth movements such as Bnai Akiva.

"It is no surprise that many militants come from the national religious camp. It is no coincidence that the demonstrations against the Labor government were attended mainly by Bnai Akiva students enrolled in yeshivot or ulpanot," he asserts. "The division between religion and politics became blurred in their eyes. The educational message they got was political. They were taught that there is an obligation to preserve a Greater Land of Israel — and that they must mobilize for that political goal."

Rubin maintains that opposition to that point of view was not tolerated. "Students were transported to anti-government rallies from school. I know of students who didn't want to attend, but were forced to do so by school authorities."

Rubin adds that not all religious youth hold extremist views. "There are many with moderate views. But this is despite their education — not because of it." He says that his own daughter and her friend stopped attending Bnai Akiva when they found that they were the only teenagers in their group who didn't hold strong right-wing views.

He acknowledges that the Education Ministry officials are discussing the need for more pluralistic education in state religious schools. But Rubin is not optimistic. "It would require a revolution to introduce pluralism into the religious school system," he maintains.

Rubin — who comes from an Orthodox Jerusalem family — identifies with Meimad, the dovish religious movement that broke away from the National Religious Party (NRP) in the eighties. He maintains that the NRP has become more extreme since its rabbis began issuing halachic edicts on political matters. "There is no conflict between democracy and Halachah, but halachic rulings on political matters are not healthy for democracy," he asserts. "That's because the bodies issuing the rulings are not elected, and because religion is absolute. Politics is the art of the compromise. You cannot compromise when you have a halachic edict.

"The NRP can't be flexible because it has to stick to halachic edicts," he argues, calling this an about face for a movement that was historically known for its ability to compromise.

Rubin does not object to rabbis examining political issues from a religious perspective. But he distinguishes between an opinion and an edict. "It is a mistake to give these rabbinical opinions the binding authority of a halachic edict," he maintains. He is especially critical of the 1995 halachic ruling issued by a group of rabbis — including leading members of the national religious camp — calling on soldiers to disobey orders to evacuate settlements. "This was a blatantly anti-democratic order which presented religious youth with a difficult dilemma."

If Rubin speaks harshly of his own camp, it is not because he absolves secular Israelis of all blame for the charged atmosphere in the country. "I live in the religious community so that is what I most care about," he explains. In fact, Rubin says that in the aftermath of Rabin's murder, the attacks by the secular left against the religious right "were all out of proportion. These attacks led members of the religious right to close ranks and justify themselves."

Rubin notes that there is goodwill and dialogue among small numbers of right and left-wing Israelis. But he is worried. "There is a feeling that we're heading too quickly towards a deep schism. I don't know whether these groups of people will succeed in bringing a halt to this process."

The professor hopes that Israel's rabbis will use their moral authority to stem the tide. "I would like to hear 200 leading rabbis issue a powerful, earth-shaking call for political tolerance. It should be a sharply-worded edict prohibiting verbal violence — something as powerful as the ruling against evacuation of settlements. If rabbis are going to issue halachic edicts on political matters, then let them issue one about this."

him in contempt. This followed his violation of an order to limit the strikes in the ports and railroads system to three hours.

Shani was picked up by police after he showed up at a Haifa chemicals demonstration. Histadrut chair Amir Peretz immediately ordered employees in all sectors of the economy to walk out over what he charged was the first ever attempt in the country to infringe upon the right to strike. His call was heeded at Ben-Gurion Airport, banks, the train system, radio and TV, several private plants and, for 20 minutes at the close of the business day, even in the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange.

This came on top of scheduled strikes by Electric Corporation employees, Bezek and the ports, where the work stoppage entered its second week and caused particularly great losses.

The wildcat side of the dispute ended some five hours after it began, when the Tel Aviv Labor Court agreed to let Shani go. Earlier, there were demonstrations in front of the Histadrut offices at Tel Aviv's Arlozoroff Street, complete with burning tires and the halting of traffic.

Netanyahu branded the strike "blatantly political, irresponsible and utterly without any grounds or justification." He added that the "country does not belong to the Histadrut, contrary to what it may think. The state is not its private property."

Representatives of employers' organizations from all sectors of the economy converged on Netanyahu's office on Sunday and urged him to take firm action against the Histadrut, so that foreign investors would not be deterred from dealing with Israel. Many stressed they were not of Netanyahu's political persuasion but that on this issue they sided with him.

The employers wanted the government to seek back-to-work orders from the courts and to enforce them. They said the deductions from employees' pay, which will not be turned over to the Histadrut, will be used as compensation for some of the losses caused by the strike. They also will initiate legal action to win further compensation, they said.

By DANIEL KURTZMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — The International Committee of the Red Cross has released a collection of World War II documents showing that the organization knew about the persecution of Jews in Nazi death camps, but felt powerless to speak out.

One of the most startling revelations contained in the records is that the Nazis agreed to let Red Cross workers into German concentration camps in March 1945 to try to ensure the prisoners' safety.

Relief workers took advantage of the disarray within the Nazi regime weeks before its defeat, pleading with concentration camp commanders to allow them access to Jewish inmates, according to the documents, which were given to the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.

After 18 months of prodding from Holocaust museum officials, the Red Cross recently agreed to change a long-standing policy and open up its wartime records to the public.

The 25,000 microfilmed pages turned over to the museum contain Red Cross workers' firsthand accounts of Nazi atrocities.

Red Cross workers "are the most credible witnesses to these crimes," Miles Lerman, chair of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council, said at a ceremony marking release of the documents.

"Your representatives were permitted into the camps and you saw the unbelievable and recorded it and kept it in your files."

The Red Cross has long acknowledged that it knew about the Nazi persecution of Jews.

But the organization has maintained that if it had disclosed that knowledge during World War II, its ability to monitor prisoner-of-war camps on both sides would have been compromised.

"The International Committee of the Red Cross has shared responsibility for the silence of the world community," said Georges Willemin, the organization's archivist. "Could we have gone further? Could we have done more? I don't know."

Lerman said the documents would help answer that question, adding, "How can one be satisfied when a world perished while the other half of the world looked on?"

When asked why it took the Red Cross more than 50 years to make the records available, Willemin said, "It takes time to face your own history."

He added that the decision to release the records "was an important change for an organization that through its history has been inclined to protect the privacy of its records so as not to run any risk of impairing its humanitarian work and its reputation for impartiality and neutrality."

Museum officials have so far only superficially examined the Red Cross records, which are expected to provide details on rescue missions, visits to concentration camps and ghettos, deportation operations and Jewish emigration during and after the war.

The documents will be available at the Holocaust museum and on the World Wide Web early next year. Copies will also be kept at Yad Vashem in Jerusalem and at the Centre for Jewish Documentation in Paris.

Netanyahu off to shaky start

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

By the skin of his teeth, Benjamin Netanyahu swept into office six months ago, nudging past the luckless Shimon Peres and making history as Israel's youngest and first directly elected prime minister.

Mideast Analysis

Netanyahu's spin doctors put out the word that he would be a different leader. He would honor the Oslo accords, but insist on "reciprocity." He would bring peace and security and nurture relations with the Palestinians and the Arab states. He would maintain good ties with the United States while expanding settlements in the territories. He would streamline the government and operate on the basis of collegiality and openness.

In retrospect, Netanyahu's record leaves much to be desired. Comparing his campaign statements with his actual deeds, the picture that emerges is that of a government which has fallen short of the mark.

Netanyahu claims that he is committed to the current peace process, despite his obvious disdain for the Oslo agreements. But exactly six months in power, Netanyahu had not advanced the process.

On Dec. 30, however, there were promising signs that Israel and the Palestinians would finally sign a long-delayed agreement on an Israeli deployment from Hebron.

Yet immense challenges lie ahead. Israel and the Palestinians have still not addressed far more complex and existential final status issues like borders, water resources, Palestinian refugees and the status of Jerusalem.

Whatever the reasons, the interminable delays in implementing the Hebron accord are symptomatic of a lamentable breakdown in trust between Israel and the Palestine Authority, led by PLO chieftain Yasser Arafat.

Netanyahu, inexplicably, waited three months before he deigned to meet Arafat in early September. And even after their strained encounter, Netanyahu did not succeed in forging a true partnership with him, as had Yitzhak Rabin and Peres.

Netanyahu's adversarial relationship with Arafat thawed somewhat at the tail end of last autumn's Washington summit, called by the United States to defuse tensions caused by three days of unprecedented Arab-Israeli violence in the territories.

But since then, Netanyahu and Arafat have met only once, and their relationship, such as it is, has been further strained by Israeli announcements that settlements will be expanded and partially subsidized and by Palestinian threats to resume the armed struggle if their goal of an independent state is blocked.

The heretofore lack of movement on the Palestinian front is matched by a dire sense of immobilism on the Syrian track. Efforts to achieve a peace treaty appear doomed by Netanyahu's opposition to the land-for-peace formula and by Syria's insistence on a total Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights. And the sabre-rattling both sides have engaged in has not contributed to calm or regional stability.

The impasse spills over into southern Lebanon, where Israel is fighting a mini war with a Syrian proxy, Hezbollah. Netanyahu's attempt last August to extricate Israel from this morass was a non-starter because he did not seem to grasp the inextricable connection between southern Lebanon and the Golan Heights.

Israel's troubles with the Syrians, as well as with the Palestinians, have had adverse repercussions in the Arab world. Egypt and Jordan - the only Arab states which have signed peace treaties with Israel - have harshly criticized Netanyahu's policies. They do not believe Netanyahu is really serious about peace. And Morocco, Tunisia Oman and Qatar have effectively frozen links with Israel.

As relations with the Arab world unravel, Israel faces the daunting prospect of a renewal of strains with the United States, following a four-year honeymoon. Of late, President Bill Clinton has strongly suggested that the settlements are an obstacle in the path toward peace.

At home, Netanyahu has fared no better. He got off to a rocky start by initially failing to include Likud heavyweights Ariel Sharon and Dan Meridor in his cabinet. And he needlessly antagonized David Levy, the foreign minister, firstly by attempting to exclude Sharon and, secondly, by trying to circumscribe Levy's powers.

Netanyahu, too, has come under fire from frustrated cabinet ministers who've complained about his penchant for secrecy and from senior national security officials who maintain that he has been recklessly disregarding their advice.

And Netanyahu's nationalist credentials have been impugned by cabinet ministers who oppose a deployment from Hebron and by observers who claim that he has ignored Palestinian violations of the Oslo accords.

Finally, Netanyahu's grandiose plans of restructuring the government, through the formation of an American-style National Security Council and a Council of Economic Advisors, have fizzled.

Clearly, the first six months of the Netanyahu era have been inauspicious.

Israel denies Jordanian proposal

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel denied this week that it had agreed to a Jordanian proposal to make Jerusalem a capital for the three great monotheistic religions.

Israeli Foreign Minister David Levy said that King Hussein had not mentioned Jerusalem as a capital of Judaism, Christianity and Islam, in any recent discussions with Israeli officials. Nor had the king sent a specific letter on the matter, Levy said.

He said the king had suggested opening an interfaith dialogue on the future of Jerusalem as a religious centre..

King Hussein's idea "is that religious leaders should meet and have a measure of dialogue about the status of Jerusalem and the holy places," Levy told Israel Radio. "This is not a political statement."

Concert promoters bring Israeli artists to Canada

By LAUREN BLANKSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — On his recent mini-Canadian concert tour, Israeli singer/guitarist David Broza was crammed into a Honda Civic and put up at Best Western Hotels. But he did have a chauffeur, two in fact, and they doubled as his promoters.

The "tour" was the brainchild of Corey Ross, 24, and Dan Freeman, 25, of Corey Ross Productions Inc., a Toronto-based concert promotions company that specializes in bringing Israeli musicians to Canada.

Broza's tour, which travelled to Montreal, Ottawa, London and Toronto, followed by Matti Caspi's concert in Toronto Dec. 14, were the latest of Ross and Freeman's projects.

They brought Noa to Toronto last May. Last winter, before Freeman – a part-time business student – joined the business, Ross brought Broza to Toronto for his first concert here since 1990.

Ross, who has a university degree in theater arts from York University, started CR Productions 1½ years ago.

"I was listening to David Broza [in '90] and decided to phone him at his home and asked him to come to Toronto to perform."

He then knocked on the door of every Jewish organization in Toronto hoping to get some financial support for his new venture but was repeatedly turned down.

"Now Jewish organizations are extremely interested in David Broza and Noa," he says, "but if I try to convince them to help me bring over Rami Kleinstein or someone else new who hasn't been proven in this market before, they're not interested."

Ethnic music scene thriving

The friends have won the support of their clients, however. "We're doing everything we can to help them," says Broza.

Over the winter holidays, the partners planned a show for Broza in Miami – a project Broza says he "threw at them to see what they could do with it."

According to Ross and Freeman, the live music industry in Toronto is in a bit of a slump, but the ethnic music scene is the one area of the industry that is thriving.

There is a heavy financial burden when working with international performers. "For the same amount of money you could do a dozen Holly Cole Trio concerts," says Ross. Not only do you have to fly in the musician and his/her crew, he says, but also "you are dealing with an artist who is a superstar elsewhere and charges prices like a superstar."

Although their hope is "to develop artists to the point where they're performing for thousands rather than a thousand," Ross and Freeman say they recognize that there is a ceiling on the Israeli/-Jewish market and they've started planning future initiatives that involve merging Canadian and Israeli talent.

"What we're trying to offer any large Canadian acts, who are relatively unheard of in Israel, is the option to perform a concert in Canada with either David Broza or whoever else we're working with at the time. Then [they would] go to Israel to perform a concert with the same person," says Ross.

"Someone who could attract 5,000 people here but no one in Israel, will expose David [Broza] to 5,000 new people and vice versa."

The team has pitched their idea to several Canadian performers including Joni Mitchell, the Barenaked Ladies and the Crash Test Dummies. "I'm fairly confident someone will say 'hey a free trip to Israel, some money' and it will happen."

Woody Allen Sings In New Musical Comedy

Cinema

• Woody Allen's latest offering, Everyone Says I Love You, opens this month in New York. It's a musical comedy – Allen calls it an old-fashioned "champagne comedy" – starring Goldie Hawn, Alan Alda, Julia Roberts, Drew Barrymore and Tim Roth, and Allen himself in the first role in which he actually sings (a few bars of Goodbye To Love).

An in-depth profile in a recent edition of New Yorker gives high praise to the film, which is Allen's 26th; he has already started work on number 27, keeping to his Herculean pace of making one film a year since 1969.

"I am both deeply depressed and exhilarated by what he does," film director Sydney Pollack is quoted as saying. "It gives me a terrible headache. If I'm lucky, in my wildest dreams I can make a picture every three years. I don't know how he does it."

The article presents Allen's persuasive defence of his conduct in the scandal involving his continuing relationship with Soon-Yi, now 26, the adopted daughter of his ex-lover Mia Farrow. It also explores his historic relations with several women, including Diane Keaton. Saying that no human could make him laugh as Keaton does, he told a story about visiting her grannies – or rather, her "grammies" – with her.

"She would say, 'Friday night, it's Grammy Keaton, and then I have to see Grammy Hall on Tuesday night.' She had me over to her house for Thanksgiving. I was sitting around with these grammies. I almost died. After dinner, they bring out a deck of cards and everybody plays penny poker. I'm sitting there with this enormous table…playing penny poker. And they're all looking at me suspiciously, like I have a scheme to take them in the card game. It was a scene I eventually put into Annie Hall."

Yiddish & Yiddishkeit

• The Ashkenaz Festival of New Yiddish Culture presents an advanced Klezmer music course with instructor David Buchbinder, director of the festival and leader of the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band. Eight sessions beginning Jan. 6, 7:30 to 9 p.m., Bloor JCC. Members $100, non-members $130.

As part of the same series, playwright-author Michael Wex teaches a course called Adventures in Yiddish – "a fun-filled frolic through the highways and byways of Yiddish words, phrases and expressions" – for four sessions beginning Feb. 6, 7:30 to 9 p.m. Members $45, non-members $65. 416-924-6211.

Drama, Television, Literature

• Stage Centre Productions presents The School For Scandal, by Richard Sheridan, Jan. 2 to 18 at Fairview Library Theatre, North York. Other plays in its current season are Cat On A Hot Tin Roof and Man of La Mancha. 416-299-5557.

• Professor E. Newton lectures on Michael Ondaatje's novel The English Patient as part of the Cultured Getaways series. York University Senate Chamber, Ross N940, Jan 7, 8 p.m. $15 (in advance). 416-636-0316.

• Visions of Eden: A Jewish Exploration of the Natural World is an ABC-TV special set to air Jan. 12. The hour-long documentary focuses on the intersection of Judaism, the environment and justice, and offers "a fascinating journey through the Bible and along the Appalachian Trail."

• New York entertainer Avi Hoffman, whose two-person revue Too Jewish? had people nearly roaring with laughter in the aisles of the Leah Posluns Theatre last spring, is returning to Toronto in March. 416-324-9413.

Competitions & Awards

• Studio 8967, the animation division of Blye-Migicovsky Productions of Toronto, won a gold medal for its one-hour animated special An Angel For Christmas at the recent WorldFest Charleston International Film Festival. One of 12 classic family tales and five original stories that the company has produced, the special was based on an original screenplay by Mark Shekter and Sherman Snukal. Executive producers were Garry Blye, John Migicovksy, Shekter and Charles Falzon.

Israeli artist brings show to Toronto

By LAUREN BLANKSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Israeli musician Matti Caspi brought his show to Toronto recently after a 3½-year performing hiatus.

The tour marks Caspi's first return to the stage since he left Israel in a flurry of controversy in 1993. After leaving his native country, where he produced 11 platinum albums of his own as well as 20 albums for other Israeli artists, Caspi spent six months in Toronto before moving to the Los Angeles area where he lives with his new wife, Rachel.

In an interview before the concert, Caspi, a singer, composer, producer and arranger, said that for the past few years he has been preparing musical arrangements for the tour.

"I am influenced by music from all over the world," Caspi said.

He also spent the time assembling his band, which is made up of musicians from the United States, India and Africa, as well as Brazilian-born Rachel who sang with him during the second half of the show.

Caspi also attempted to set things straight about rumors that he had joined a cult and converted. "I will always be Israeli and I will always be Jewish," he said in Hebrew, a statement that was met with thunderous applause from the audience of approximately 600.

Caspi entertained with his wit and playful banter. He alternated between playing the guitar and keyboards and singing in Hebrew nostalgic tunes such as Somebody, You Have Shown Me The Way, Ho Bi Di Bam Bam and What Is Love?

He gave the crowd a sneak preview of two of his new songs, Suyanna and Shawn, which will be on his not-yet-released album. He also performed two songs in English – How Insensitive and I've Got You Under My Skin – as a duet with his wife.

Caspi said an album in English and one in Portuguese are in the works.

Caspi, wife perform in Hebrew, Portuguese

Caspi and his wife performed together in Hebrew and Portuguese, but the Portuguese melodies lacked the spirit of Caspi's Hebrew music.

Prior to the Toronto engagement at the Danforth Music Hall, the concert tour took in Washington, New York and Los Angeles. Over the next few months Caspi and his band will hit Europe and Brazil. In addition, he said he is planning to take the tour to Israel sometime next summer.

Travel Talk

Swept Away At Niagara Falls

The Niagara Falls Visitor and Convention Bureau gave me an envelope filled with complimentary admission tickets to local museums and fun houses, and for a couple of hours I was like a kid again as I visited them all in succession.

The Ripley's Believe It Or Not! Museum, the Guinness Book of World Records Museum, Louis Tussaud's Wax Museum, the JFK Assassination Institute, the Elvis Museum, the wonderfully oddball Niagara Falls Museum – all these were on my list. So was something called the Ripley's Moving Theatre and, prepared for a moving experience, I gave my ticket and waited to be admitted.

There were two shows to choose from, Jurassic Park and the Roller Coaster. I chose the Roller Coaster, having very little idea of what I was in for. "This isn't a real roller coaster, is it?" I asked. "Oh, no, sir, it's just a simulation." I had heard of these simulated rides where the seats tilt a quarter-inch this way or that, giving the occupant the remarkable illusion of great movement.

I should have become suspicious when I took my seat and the usher advised me to do up the seat belt. Likewise when I put my camera bag down on the platform at my feet and she said, "Oh, no, you can't put it there, it'll fly out once the ride starts." I also should have been tipped off by the large handlebar-type grips on each side of the strangely enclosed seat.

Lights out, and the huge movie screen showed the view one would have from a roller coaster just starting to climb up a steep track. Instantly I had an ominous feeling as the seat slowly tilted back. At the crest of the curve, there was a moment of perfect stasis – and then I was thrown violently this way and that, up and down and back and forth, as the roller coaster descended and raced around the devilish course at breakneck speeds.

I considered bailing out of my seat, a somewhat risky proposition given the intensity of the motion, when the scene suddenly shifted to a car rally in the desert. I felt every bump as I bounced over the dirt road at a subsonic clip. A few moments later I crashed into some rocks and was instantly transported to a narrow mountain canyon. The scenes kept shifting until I felt like I was churning in a giant mixmaster.

I turned away, unable to watch anymore, just holding on for dear life. Then I noticed that all the other screaming people in Ripley's Moving Theatre were 17 years old or younger. Blessedly, the ride stopped and I wandered out in a cold sweaty daze. Only then did I see the sign, warning that the ride is not for pregnant women or anyone with back, heart, neck and a variety of other physical and nervous conditions.

Would I go into the Ripley's Moving Theatre again? Sure – right after my next parachute-jumping lesson.

As for the high point of my visit to Niagara Falls, it was the pyramid-shaped IMAX theatre in which I watched an excellent documentary on Niagara in a comfortable seat that stayed put for the entire screening.

TORONTO — When management consultant David Talbot first thought about using visualization exercises with his clients, he was skeptical.

"It won't work," he said of the psychological tool that requires individuals to creatively visualize and describe their future success. "You can't get business people to close their eyes. They're not flower children."

But Talbot tested the tactic during a consultation with Aish HaTorah's board of directors and the results were surprisingly positive. "It was amazing," he says. "It blew me away!"

Ten years later, Talbot has created and developed Business Huddle, an approach to planning and problem-solving meetings that uses both psychology and computer technology. It is a unique system that provides clients with a fast-paced yet thorough brainstorming and strategic-planning session that takes only four to five hours.

To begin, Talbot, who acts as Business Huddle's facilitator, asks the group to pretend it's a year from today and to visualize the organization's success. Although the technique is different from those used in most business meetings, he says it has frequently been applied by sports instructors and drama teachers.

"The whole purpose behind visualizing success is to picture it as if it has already happened. So that's what we do," Talbot says.

Next, each person is required to describe the steps that he or she would take to arrive at this successful situation. What follows is an open exchange of ideas that members are forbidden to criticize or challenge.

Why I Hate Meetings

Dr. Gordon Laurie, a senior consultant at Hatch Associates who has used Business Huddle on several occasions, said, Talbot "keeps away from the jargon. He doesn't try to define mission statements and cause consternation and confusion by people arguing about what one word means."

Talbot, who worked as a product manager for IBM Canada in the 1960s, incorporates state-of-the-art technology that includes a projection screen, computer system and digital projector. Present at every Business Huddle is a technographer who keys the comments made by all participants into a computer at 100 words a minute.

The computer is connected to a projection screen that displays these ideas almost simultaneously. This way, the group can objectively consider the ideas on the screen, rather than subjectively evaluating the individual who has voiced the opinion.

"Imagine you're sitting in a movie theatre with your sweetheart or your spouse and you whisper in his ear and everything that you say shows up on the screen. That's an attention grabber. Well, that's how the Huddle works," Talbot says.

After the ideas have been recorded, the group analyses the "hurdles" that might stand in the way of achieving the success they visualized. They then list possible solutions to these obstacles until they have designed an appropriate action plan.

This plan consists of tasks which are then delegated to particular employees along with corresponding deadlines.

Over 3,000 people have participated in more than 500 of Business Huddle's sessions. Its clients include Bank of Montreal, Life Network, Stelco and Sony (Canada).

The bottom line, Talbot says, is that with his system, companies can save money. He claims that in three to four hours, he can accomplish what normally requires 30 to 40 hours for conventional strategic planning. And that can mean a difference in cost of thousands of dollars for organizations.

Talbot says that Business Huddle "is the way most meetings will be conducted in the next 10 years." He's so weary of traditional board meetings, he's writing a book called Why I Hate Meetings.

Groundling Marsh an international success

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Galileo, Maggie and the other characters on children's television show Groundling Marsh may look like cuddly toys, but the $10,000 puppets are not made to stand up to children's play.

Every year they must be returned to their New York manufacturer for maintenance. Their dirty hands are replaced and repairs are made. When not in use, the Muppet-like puppets are stored in temperature- and humidity-controlled environments.

"They're very difficult to build and a long period of time in design," said Joy Rosen, 39, co-producer of Groundling Marsh, referring to the high cost of the puppets.

Rosen and Lisa Olfman, 41, her partner in Portfolio Film & Television Inc., the production and distribution company they formed in 1991, deliberated over every detail of the groundlings' appearance, including the exact shade of custom-dyed fur.

Each decision took on monumental importance. "We realized this [show] would be our calling card for a while," said Rosen in an interview at a west-end television studio the day the 65th — and possibly final — episode was filmed.

Thus far, Groundling Marsh, Rosen and Olfman's first independent production, has served them very well as a calling card on their frequent trips to broadcasting trade shows in North America and Europe.

Over the past two years, the number of children's cable channels has proliferated worldwide, and Rosen and Olfman have reaped the benefits. Their upbeat, environmentally oriented half-hour show, produced in partnership with J.A. Delmage Productions Ltd., is seen five days a week on YTV in Canada. It's also shown in 93 other territories including Iceland, Portugal, South Africa and a number of Arab countries.

In Israel, the series, which uses songs and gently humorous stories to promote environmental and human values, is known as HaBotzanim (The Mud People).

Named Best Children's Series at the 1995 New York Film Festival, it has received some half dozen industry awards. In October, the Disney Channel (which co-produced the last 26 episodes) purchased the series to air in the United States and Britain. Fox Broadcasting Co. runs the series on its children's networks in Australia and Latin America.

In 1995, Portfolio produced an interactive Groundling Marsh movie for the U.S.-based Greenwich Entertainment Group. The Great Cave Adventure, a half-hour choose-your-own-adventure-type video, has been featured for over a year at The Amazing Space, a family entertainment centre at the Mall of Americas in Bloomington, Minn. and 21 affiliated locations.

Joy Rosen, left and Lisa Olfman pose next to the hollow tree on the Groundling Marsh set with puppets Eco and Galileo.

The next step for Portfolio is a Groundling Marsh merchandising campaign. They plan to launch a home video in the United States in the third quarter of this year. They expect to have toys, puzzles, books and clothing on the market here and in the United States around the same time. A CD-ROM is also in the works.

The recent filming of the 65th episode enables Groundling Marsh to go into syndication. Cost per episode has been "at the high end, from a Canadian point of view," said Rosen. "We spend what we feel we need to spend to compete globally for this market."

The mammoth west-end industrial-area studio with its oversize fantasy wetland sets (most of which have now been donated because of high storage costs) was a far cry from the spare bedroom in Olfman's house where the partners originally set up shop. They started out with one telephone and an antiquated fax machine on which they spent hours hand-cranking proposals in the middle of the night to take advantage of low overseas phone rates.

Portfolio is about to move into its second office where they have a staff of five, including themselves. When the show was in production, their staff expanded to 65 people.

The two women are best friends as well as partners. Both former Montrealers, they met when Olfman hired Rosen in 1983 to work on Lorne Greene's New Wilderness television show.

Olfman had begun her television career at CFCF-TV in Montreal, becoming the first woman to sell her own game show series at a network level. Her background includes a stint in CITY-TV's news department in Toronto. Eventually she became vice-president and general manager of Venture Entertainment Group, where she put together a sixteen-picture Canada/France co-production deal.

Rosen first worked in children's television at Cambium Film & Video Productions. Later, as director of marketing at Sullivan Films Distribution, she handled world sales for the miniseries Anne of Green Gables and its sequel.

With homes in the same area of the city and husbands who get along well with each other, they spend some of their off-hours together and even take turns doing each other's Sunday food shopping.

Both women agree that working with a best friend is an advantage. "You have a level of trust," said Olfman.

Business-wise, their backgrounds and skills complement each other. Rosen's expertise was in distribution; Olfman's in financing and production.

They had often talked about going into business together, but "reality kept getting in the way," said Rosen. "I moved out west. She got a fabulous job. I got a fabulous job."

By the time they set up Portfolio, both had married and started families. Rosen now has three children, ages 8, 6 and 6 months; Olfman has two, ages 10 and 2.

"We had enough stability in our lives to take the financial investments," said Rosen. "The banks were not prepared to lend us money. We were far enough along that we were both making healthy salaries."

It took a year and a half before they were able to draw salaries again and six months after that until they moved into a proper office.

To finance their own show, they began calling producers to acquire programs for distribution. Groundling Marsh got off the ground in 1993 with seed money from Telefilm Canada and YTV.

"It wasn't the best way to start [a business], because we were undercapitalized," said Rosen. "All your assets become the collateral. That's a fairly big stake. We learned how to be lean and mean. We never got into debt."

Although the salaries they drew initially were modest compared to their previous income, today Portfolio provides "a living." But it could be gone tomorrow, said a cautious Olfman.

That seems unlikely. Portfolio has several projects in the works, as well as about 200 hours of television – probably about 40 different shows – which it sells in addition to Groundling Marsh.

An animated Chanukah special,which is being written by Phoebe Gilman based on her book Something from Nothing, is expected to be released next year in conjunction with YTV here and PBS in the United States. Portfolio is also working on an animated series based on the British book My Naughty Little Sister, and a series for preteens called Biz Kid, about a 10-year-old who finds herself in charge of a major toy company.

Rosen and Olfman are happy that their children can be involved in their work; it was in fact one of their goals and a raison d'être when they began.

"The hours are long – 8 a.m. to 7 p.m. when we're in production. We travel a lot. There are negatives," said Rosen. "But we're doing work our children can participate in and relate to. It's a wonderful opportunity for them to hang around the set. This is partially theirs as well."

Rosen says she still gets excited for Monday morning. "The day I start dreading Mondays is the day I give it up."

Hockey lore galore in book on Habs captains

Nine greats who wore the 'C'

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Let's start with an admission. I hates da Habs.

Sure, they've won more Stanley Cups than anyone else and some of the best players ever have worn the bleu, rouge et blanc. But how good would they be without the luck they get from that horseshoe at centre ice? When was the last time a ref's call went against them in a big game at the Forum or the Molson whatchamacallit?

Despite all that, there's a new hockey book out there that's worth a read. Michael Ulmer, a writer with The Hockey News, has recently penned Canadiens Captains (Macmillan Canada), profiles of nine Habs who've worn the "C."

Last year, Ulmer wrote a similar book on Maple Leafs captains and no doubt its success spawned this year's successor volume.

With colorful anecdotes, Ulmer digs into the players' backgrounds to find the elements that gave them the drive, determination and ambition to become top-shelf hockey players. Many, it turns out, grew up in small towns and came from (mostly blue collar) families of modest means.

The book pulls no punches in describing the failings of otherwise successful men, particularly Doug Harvey, whose battle with the bottle is described in detail.

Another interesting volume for hockey enthusiasts is Pro Hockey Play by Play; The Ultimate NHL Guide by Ted Montgomery, published by Macmillan Canada.

Each year Montgomery analyzes the teams in the NHL, provides capsule comments on players and reviews the previous year's playoffs. Mixing humor with some astute insights, Montgomery has hit on a formula that should make the book an entertaining read for any hockey fan.

Here's a Habs hockey quiz, based on Canadiens Captains, to get you primed for the rest of the season:

1. Jean Beliveau was the longest serving Habs captain, with 679 games played while wearing the "C." Who's number two?

2. Which Habs Hall of Famer holds the record for playing on the most Stanley Cup-winning teams? Who's number two/

3. Which Habs captain kept the puck in the Soviet zone to help set up Paul Henderson for his memorable series-winning goal in the 1972 hockey summit?

4. Which Habs captain earned Stanley Cup rings with both the Montreal Canadiens and the Montreal Maroons?

5. Which captain had a 2 points per game (ppg) average in the playoffs, a record that stood until Wayne Gretzky eclipsed it with 2.35 ppg in 1983?

6. Which goalie did Rocket Richard beat for his 50th goal in 50 games? When?

7. Which Habs line finished 1-2-3 in scoring and in which year?

8. This Habs captain retired as the all-time leader in playoff assists (97) and points (176). Who is he?

9. This Hall of Famer captained the Canadiens after Maurice Richard retired following the Habs' string of five consecutive Stanley Cups in the 1950s. Who is he?

ANSWERS:

1. Although he toiled in relative anonymity compared to the more colorful Habs captains who preceded him, Bob Gainey was second only to Beliveau in the number of games played as captain. Between 1981-89, he notched up 569 games wearing the "C."

A tremendous skater with modest offensive abilities, he was paid a tremendous compliment following the famous 1975 New Year's Eve game against the Soviet Red Army team. Army coach Viktor Tikhonov called him "technically, the best player in the world."

2. Jean Beliveau and Rocket Richard are perhaps the two best known Habs ever, renowned for their tremendous playoff performances. However, neither holds the honor of playing on the most cup-winning teams. That distinction belongs to Henri "The Pocket Rocket" Richard, who played on 11 cup-winners.

Beliveau is next with 10.

Henri Richard, the Rocket's kid brother, played 20 seasons in the NHL from 1955-75. During the Habs' run of five consecutive cups, Richard scored seven goals and 15 assists in 25 cup final games.

In 1966, he scored a controversial cup-winning goal against Detroit in overtime of Game 6 when, driving the net, he was checked and fell and had the puck lodge in his equipment. He and the puck ended up in the net and the Habs had another cup.

During the 1971 finals, rookie coach Al MacNeil benched Richard for two periods of Game 5 versus Chicago. Afterwards, Richard complained to the francophone media, saying MacNeil was the worst coach he'd ever played for.

In Game 7, he came off the bench to score the tying and winning goals as the Habs beat the Hawks. He won his last cup in 1973 as the Canadiens again beat the Blackhawks.

3. As one of the best teams of the early '70s, the Canadiens were well represented on the NHL team that faced the Soviets in the '72 series. Among them was rightwinger Yvan Cournoyer. He scored three goals during the eight-game series and in the final game in Moscow, he played a hunch to remain on the ice when he was supposed to come off on a line change.

With his centre and leftwinger already on the bench, "the puck went into their zone. 'I said ... one more time.' I had decided to go out and they didn't see me go back. That's where I intercepted the pass. Henderson came from the bench and Phil Esposito came from the bench.

"I tried to reach Paul but somebody tripped him. The puck went around and Phil picked up the puck. By that time, Paul got up and got in front and, bingo."

4. Although he's remembered more today for his tenure as a successful coach, Hector "Toe" Blake also served as captain of the Canadiens from 1941-47. But before that, he played on the old Montreal Maroons hockey club where he won one cup in 1935 as a rookie.

The next season, he was sent to the American League's Providence Reds and in February 1936 was traded to the Habs for goalie Lorne Chabot and centre Bill Miller.

Blake went on to win two more cups as player (over 13 seasons) and eight as a coach. In 1939 he won the Hart and Art Ross Trophies.

5. Before the Great One came along, Toe Blake held the playoff record of 2 ppg for 39 years. In the 1944 playoffs, Blake scored seven goals and 18 points in nine games. During his playing career, Blake scored the Stanley Cup-winning goals in 1944 and '46. He was a first team all-star three times and he made the second team twice.

6. Richard was the first NHLer to score 50 goals — and he did it in 50 games when, on March 18, 1945, he beat Boston's Harvey Bennett. The previous goal-scoring mark was set by Joe Malone (another Hab, what else?) in 1918, the NHL's inaugural season, when Malone bulged the twine 44 times.

Since Richard's remarkable feat, only Mike Bossy, Brett Hull, Gretzky and Mario Lemieux have scored 50 in 50 (or less).

7. There have been many great Habs lines who gave goaltenders fits. You can think of lines built around great scorers like Guy Lafleur and Peter Mahovlich, or Jean Beliveau and Boom Boom Geoffrion, but it was the Habs' famed "Punch Line" of Blake, Rocket Richard and Elmer Lach who finished 1-2-3 in league scoring in 1944-45.

Blake, the grinder, was third, and perhaps not that surprisingly, Lach, the centre, finished first. Rocket was second with 50 goals.

8. During the 1971 playoffs, 39-year-old Jean Beliveau scored six goals and added a record 16 assists, en route to his 10th cup win. Those points boosted his lifetime totals to 97 assists and 176 points overall.

Beliveau retired after the '71 season with 507 regular season goals, second only to the Rocket, and his playoff goal total was three behind the Rocket's. However, during the early 1950s, Beliveau played three seasons for the Quebec Aces even though the Habs actively sought his services. Had he joined them at age 18, his totals would probably have been higher.

9. Hall of Famer Doug Harvey succeeded Richard as captain in 1960. He held the position for only one season before being traded to New York.

Harvey was considered the premier defenceman of his era and Blake once called him the best ever, eclipsing even Bobby Orr.

Harvey was a seven-time Norris Trophy winner as best defenceman and Ulmer credits him with helping develop the firewagon style of hockey associated with the Canadiens. Harvey used to say he would never pass it to a winger unless he was moving, Ulmer notes.

Harvey quarterbacked Montreal's fearsome powerplay that was so good, it prompted the NHL to change the rule in 1956-57 so that a player could leave the penalty box when his team was scored upon (before that, he had to served the full two minutes regardless of the number of goals scored).

Cognitive therapy may prevent depression relapse

Becoming aware of thought processes

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to the CJN

TORONTO – Major depression is one of the most prevalent health concerns among North American adults and those who recover are at significant risk for a relapse, says a psychologist with the Clarke Institute of Psychiatry.

A relapse may be prevented however, if the patient participates in cognitive therapy, a form of psychotherapy that teaches a person to become aware of their thought processes, Mark Lau told a recent meeting of the Mood Disorders Association of Metropolitan Toronto.

Lau, who is working on a pilot study on cognitive therapy at Clarke Institute, said that a depressed person typically responds to daily events in a negative way.

"These people have thoughts that centre around themselves. If, for example, they are confronted with a difficult task, they assume they will never be able to complete it and therefore do not attempt it at all. They begin to feel worthless and their thoughts take a vicious downward spiral," he said.

A depressed person often suffers from cognitive distortions, an all or nothing type of thinking, said Lau."They regard themselves as failures if they fall short of perfect, or else they see a single event as a never-ending pattern. To them, one poor exam may mean their entire career is on the line. Or, they may reject a positive experience as being insignificant. They did well in one exam, but the professor graded the paper far too easily."

In cognitive therapy, participants learn how to pull themselves away from negative thoughts and "instead of being caught in a whirlpool in the middle of a pond, they get on shore and go where they want to go," he said.

Treatment through cognitive therapy is short-term and goal oriented, said Lau. "In the 10 to 20 weeks that we meet with the patients, we are focused towards an end. If, for example, a person does not work and cannot motivate himself to leave his home in the morning, we teach him the skills to push through those obstacles that are blocking him. We set goals and build on them slowly.

"As well, by providing a patient with information about their disorder, we can often normalize their experience. They feel less unique. They step back and view themselves from a wider perspective," he said.

Patients who have recovered from an episode of depression have a high incidence of relapse, said Lau, because they have "easy access to negative thoughts. Cognitive therapy can still be used while they are well, to head off a future episode. We design an intervention for the person to use when they detect interference by negative thoughts.

"Our goal in the prevention of depression is to normalize states of sadness so they remain mild or transient and do not escalate. Being aware of their thoughts may be enough to pull them back from the spiral — bring their attention back to the here and now."

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I am currently dieting to lose weight and I am always reading about drinking healthy juice. Is it a wise choice on a weight reduction diet, and how much is an appropriate amount?

B. Many people are not aware that although juices do contain a lot of valuable vitamins and minerals, they are usually quite high in calories. An eight ounce glass of cranberry juice can have 144 calories so if you drink just three glasses per day, you could be drinking 500 calories.

A better way to get the vitamins and minerals found in juice is to eat the whole fruit. That way, you consume fewer calories, feel fuller and also get a source of fibre.

Q. Last week a friend and I had a disagreement while out for lunch. She was in the mood for a hamburger but opted for a large caesar salad, claiming that she should eat something lighter. Did she really choose the lighter meal?

A. You were right to question her decision.Many people assume that salads are always a lighter choice, but in fact they can be very deceiving. While salads do have a lot of valuable nutrients, including fibre, they may also be loaded with added calories and fat. A caesar salad with creamy dressing makes it anything but a light choice. A large caesar salad can have up to 48 grams of fat and 456 calories from the dressing alone. If eggs, cheese, buttery croutons or meat are added, the calories and fat increase even further.

A 3-1/2 ounce hamburger with a bun has about 400 calories and 23 grams of fat. While the calories in the hamburger and salad are about equal, the fat in the hamburger is half that of the caesar salad.

Salad, however, can be a healthy, light choice if you watch out for the added fat.

As a dietician, I am always happy to see people trying to make healthy choices in their diet, but the choices are not always beneficial. These letters should help to dispel some common nutrition myths.

Social worker Sorele Urman provides family counselling as part of a new Baycrest community service.

Baycrest counselling focuses on relationship with elderly

TORONTO — Whether you are 16 or 60, problems are bound to arise in family relationships. You may argue with your siblings or have trouble communicating with your parents. So what happens when your parents get older, their health declines and it is becoming difficult for them to manage on their own? What is your role in the care of your aging parents and how can you help them?

Finding the answers that are best for you and your parents is the goal of a new counselling service being offered at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care. Headed by Sorele Urman, a social worker with 32 years' experience in the field, the new service assists families who are having problems in their relationship with an elderly relative.

"This service is designed for families who want help but are not seeking admission to a Baycrest program or service," Urman explains. "They are looking for immediate direction from a reputable source."

By offering individualized counselling on a fee-for-service basis, Baycrest can accommodate the needs of families who don't know where to turn for help, Urman says.

"Other community agencies and social workers offer family counselling, but because this is a Baycrest service, we have a wealth of experience and resources behind us that are specific to the needs of the elderly."

Some of the goals of the counselling service are to strengthen individual coping skills, provide emotional support and guidance, help face loss associated with illness and disability, provide bereavement counselling, assist with planning for current and future care, provide information about community resources and deal with relationship challenges.

"We can provide tips on how to choose a paid caregiver, what to expect as your parents age, how to set up a house to accommodate a caregiver; and we will also do a home visit," says Urman.

Fees are charged on a sliding scale according to a person's ability to pay. They range from $30 to $75 per session. For families of an elderly relative waiting for admission to a Baycrest program, counselling is still available at no cost.

For more information, call Urman at 785-2379.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

I don't know where to turn. My grandparents (Bubbie and Zayde, 77 and 84 years old) have been married for 57 years and have taken good care of each other. Unfortunately, these past few years have gone downhill. My Zayde had two strokes, and was diagnosed with throat cancer and my Bubbie has been diagnosed with Alzheimer's. They are really proud people who won't accept any outside help. How can I, as a caring granddaughter, help them as much as they have helped me?

Dear S.E.,

Your concern is commendable. However, you have to accept them the way they are, remembering that they grew up in a different time with certain values that you might not understand. To them, accepting outside help might be a sign of weakness or lack of devotion to each other. Just continue to love them, visit them and be there for them when they want you.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

WJC considers Swiss boycott

By MICHELE CHABIN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Angered by what it termed "remarks bordering on anti-Semitism" made by the outgoing president of Switzerland, the World Jewish Restitution Organization (WJRO) has announced a series of retaliatory measures that would include a boycott of Swiss banks.

Two top officials of the WJRO held a news conference here last Sunday to unveil their proposals and to voice their impatience with the slow pace of negotiations regarding the return of Jewish assets deposited in Swiss banks during the Holocaust.

The officials sharply condemned the remarks of outgoing Swiss president Jean-Pascal Delamuraz, who last week dismissed as "blackmail" calls from Jewish groups for his nation to set up a $250 million fund to begin compensating Holocaust victims and their heirs who might be entitled to money deposited in Swiss banks in the World War II era.

"If we agreed now to a compensation fund, this would be taken as an admission of guilt," Delamuraz told the newspaper Tribune de Genève the day before he stepped down from the presidency.

"This is nothing less than extortion and blackmail," added Delamuraz, who occupied the largely ceremonial post of president until Jan. 1 under the rotating system. "This fund would make it much more difficult to establish the truth."

Delamuraz has since said he was sorry if he offended families of Holocaust victims, but repeated his view that it was not the right time to set up a compensation fund.

Instead, the Swiss government will wait until its newly appointed historical commission determines whether Switzerland misappropriated Jewish assets, said Delamuraz, who now serves as Swiss economics minister.

At the news conference, the WJRO said it might attempt to implement the series of punitive measures if Swiss authorities do not denounce Delamuraz' statements and accelerate their investigation into Swiss-held Jewish assets from the Holocaust.

Genetic link found among kohanim

By JUDY SIEGEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Jews of the priestly tribe (kohanim) – both Ashkenazi and Sephardi – have been found to share a variation of the Y chromosome that links them with Aaron the High Priest, who lived 3,300 years ago.

Special Feature

This was the result of a study conducted by Prof. Karl Skorecki, a senior nephrologist at Rambam Hospital in Haifa and head of molecular medicine at the Technion's medical school, along with colleagues in Haifa, London and Arizona. Their finding was published yesterday in the British science journal Nature.

The researchers took samples of genetic material from unrelated Jewish men in the three countries, and asked them whether they were from the priestly tribe. Tissue was taken by swabbing the inside of their cheeks.

The phenotypes of 188 secular and religious Jews who said they were kohanim were found to be very different from those who said they were not. Skorecki said the researchers did not identify kohanim according to their names (such as Cohen or other names of kohanim such as Rappaport or Shapiro), but by asking them to state if they were kohanim.

Skorecki, who is himself a kohen, said that the idea for the study came to him when he was attending synagogue services and saw another kohen being called up to the Torah for the first aliyah.

"I looked at him and noted we didn't look alike, but that nevertheless, according to tradition, we both descended from the priestly tribe. I wanted to know if it were possible to find a genetic connection."

Based on surveys of Jewish gravestones, about five percent of the seven million male Jews around the world belong to the priestly tribe. This means 350,000 men, or about 100,000 to 120,000 in Israel alone.

The priesthood performed major Jewish rituals from the time of Aaron (Moses' brother, who headed the Levite tribe) and received fixed portions of the sacrifices in the First and Second Temples.

The News in Brief

The Cosmos: Tracking Sagan's Jewish Feelings

By ERIC J. GREENBERG
The New York Jewish Week

Carl Sagan's love of science was well known throughout the cosmos. But his feelings about his own ethnicity were almost painfully private.

The Brooklyn-born astronomer died late last month from pneumonia, a complication of a bone marrow disease called myelodysplasia. He was 62.

Sagan, who attended P.S. 101 on Benson Avenue as a child, was Jewish, though it is not clear what he thought about Judaism.

"He thought of himself as a Jew," said longtime colleague Lawrence Slobodkin, a professor of ecology at the State University in Stony Brook.

But what that meant, Slobodkin could not say.

Rabbi Steve Shaw, director of community education at the Conservative Jewish Theological Seminary in Manhattan, said that in recent years, Sagan, best known as the host of the popular 1980s PBS series "Cosmos," came to see JTS Chancellor Ismar Schorsch as his rabbi.

"They had several conversations," Rabbi Shaw recalled. "[Schorsch] had the feeling that Sagan was open to changing his mind about religion, that somehow he identified with the kind of Judaism he saw personified at the seminary."

"He wrote me back a lovely letter. It was something he was not exposed to before."

In fact, Sagan is credited with helping found the National Religious Partnership for the Environment, which brings together scientists and theologians to fight for environmental protection.

Rabbi David Saperstein, director of the Reform movement's Religious Action Center in Washington, D.C., said he knew Sagan for about 10 years, when they both worked on the nuclear arms issue.

"He believed that religious leaders and scientists had a great deal to say to each other," Rabbi Saperstein said.

When Sagan was working on his last book, Demon Haunted World, a treatise against New Age beliefs overpowering science, he sent a draft to Rabbi Saperstein.

Over the years Sagan remained mum about his own personal views on his Jewish heritage. "He was never comfortable talking about his own past," Rabbi Saperstein said.

It will remain another mystery in the universe.

Hebron Arrests

JERUSALEM – Fifteen Kiryat Arba residents were arrested trying to move into an abandoned building in Hebron's casbah before dawn Dec. 31, in a last-ditch attempt to establish facts on the ground before most of the city is turned over to Palestinian control.

Ten people, carrying signs, were arrested in the casbah while trying to make their way to the building – which the settlers maintain is Jewish property– and were released from police custody later in the day.

Kurdish Rebel Attacks

JERUSALEM – Israeli officials have expressed concern about the possibility of coordinated attacks by Palestinian terrorists and Kurdish rebels against Israeli targets in Turkey.

Members of the Kurdish underground and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine recently met, the Israeli daily Ha'aretz recently reported.

Japanese Heroes

JERUSALEM – Three Japanese officials during World War II stepped forward to help save the lives of as many as 20,000 Jews, according to documents and recent testimony. The trio acted against Germany's interests after the refugees became stranded in a Russian border town near the Japanese puppet state of Manchukuo in northeastern China.

Jewish Newspaper Closes

SKOKIE, Ill. – After 85 years, the Sentinel, a weekly serving the Chicago Jewish community, has ceased publication.

The end came quickly and quietly without prior notice to either employees or readers.

The last issue, dated Dec. 26, contained no indication that the publication would not continue.

SADAT'S THREATS TAKEN SERIOUSLY

Israeli leaders are taking very seriously the Egyptian threat to renew warfare along the Suez Canal as Egypt's President Anwar Sadat's "year of decision" ends. But differences of opinion surfaced as to whether Israel's response to an Egyptian attack should be an all out thrust for victory or a limited war.

Most observers believe Sadat is not thinking in terms of full-scale hostilities but is considering a renewal of the war of attrition carried out by his predecessor Gamel Abdel Nasser.

HADASSAH ON THE MOVE

Once relegated to the back rooms of executive meetings, women are now making their mark on the decision-making bodies of most communal organizations. This move has not come about as a result of the gallant efforts of a few male leaders, but by the applied pressure of determined women.

Such a woman is Neri Bloomfield, 47, who is soon to be the youngest president-elect of Canadian Hadassah, one of the largest women's organizations in Canada, a chapter of World Hadassah-WIZO.

The Lowest Burial Cost Available from Any Jewish Establishment

When economy is a major consideration, you should know that Hebrew Basic Burial offers the lowest interment costs available from any Jewish establishment. Keeping burial costs low is in no way a negative reflection on either the family or the departed. Families who have used Hebrew Basic Burial's services have all found that dignity and observance of Jewish law were exactly as they should be.

Low cost is just one of many factors which may be involved in arranging a burial that meets a family's emotional and spiritual needs. We welcome inquiries from people who would like to know more about the option of a basic Jewish graveside service and the savings that go with it.

60 Minutes to examine war criminals in Canada

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

CBS may visit suspects interviewed by detective

TORONTO – The top-rated U.S. newsmagazine 60 Minutes is coming to Canada to shoot a segment on suspected Nazi war criminals living in this country.

Reporter Mike Wallace has lined up interviews with several experts in the area, including Irving Abella, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' (CJC) war crimes committee.

The 60 Minutes team may travel to other Canadian cities besides Toronto, segment producer Bob Anderson told The CJN in a telephone interview from New York.

But Anderson said he couldn't say more, as the segment is still being researched.

Interviews will be conducted later this month and a February air date is probable, Anderson said.

A source told The CJN that 60 Minutes has requested interviews with Justice Minister Allan Rock and former solicitor general Robert Kaplan, under whose watch Canada's first legal action against a suspected Nazi war criminal, Albert Helmut Rauca, took place. Rauca was extradited from Canada in 1983 and died in a West German jail awaiting trial.

Also scheduled to be interviewed are Justice Jules Deschênes, who authored the 1986 report on war criminals that began the modern process of court proceedings, and Bernie Farber, national director of community relations for CJC.

Asked whether 60 Minutes' interest in Canada was piqued following the explosive findings of New York private detective Steven Rambam, who tracked down some 140 suspected Nazi war criminals living here, Anderson said only that the program "is aware" of Rambam.

According to The CJN source, 60 Minutes will also interview Rambam, who was the subject of a recent full-edition documentary on CBC's The Journal.

The source said that as far as he knows, 60 Minutes will attempt to visit some of the suspects Rambam had seen, several of whom confessed to having committed atrocities against Jews.

One year ago in this space, I advised readers that everything about The CJN springs from the broadly worded mandate as conceived by its Board of Directors "to serve the Jewish people in Canada, in Israel and in all its habitations."

Today, at the outset of a new year, it is appropriate to recall that mandate. It is not only a high responsibility, it is also a unique, much-cherished opportunity.

As we have often written in this space, the core activity by which the paper seeks to fulfil its mandate, is in attempting to "inform" our readers in the best way that we can.

In bringing news to our readers, we try to do so reliably, dispassionately and comprehensively.

In bringing opinion, analysis or commentary to our readers, we try to do so in a balanced manner, openly publishing the perspectives and the passions of various writers.

News, opinion, analysis and commentary are the bricks of the structure which carries the weight of the directors' mandate.

The better the community is informed, the more likely it is to be vibrant and confident, or, again in the words of the directors, "to be spiritually alive, intellectually alert, socially responsible and economically secure, and thus a great asset to Canada and to Jewish communities throughout the world, including Israel."

But the mortar that holds the structure in place are the credibility, reliability and relevance of the paper to its readership.

To ensure our relevance, we constantly strive in small steps and modest evolutions for higher reaches and wider audiences, and in particular, for instructive, meaningful, evocative, perhaps even eye-opening ways to highlight the Jewish aspect of this Jewish newspaper.

Of course the "Jewish aspect" is a priceless stone of 13 million reflections, as diverse as snowflakes that fall from the sky, as rich as the dark green velvet of a British Columbia forest, and as deep as the ocean.

In our ongoing effort to capture as many of those reflections as possible, our newspaper is destined to be a perpetual "work-in-progress."

Thus, readers will be noticing, and indeed will have already noticed in last week's issue, certain changes in The CJN.

For example, we are introducing three new monthly columnists.

Shel Krakofsky, one of Canada's most poignant writers within a new generation of writers, and whose poetry and prose have been featured in The CJN, will now appear with Jean Gerber, our monthly columnist from Vancouver.

Justin Korda, the editor of Dateline:Middle East, a student publication in Montreal, makes his debut this week as our campus voice from McGill University, with Viva Press our campus voice from Dalhousie University, in Halifax.

Martin Himel, currently Global Television's Middle East correspondent, and an experienced observer of life in Israel, will soon be appearing alongside Emil Fackenheim.

In the near future, we plan to introduce a regular monthly column that will explore and explain and expound upon issues of Jewish education that beset parents daily in many difficult and frustrating manifestations.

Continuing to anchor our efforts will be the Perspectives essay, which will offer readers ideas, polemics and pleas from an array of top-flight thinkers.

One year ago, I wrote in this space the following description of our aspirations and hopes for The CJN. That description is as valid today, one year later: "In an age when news was obtained only from print or radio, the Jewish newspaper was a precious lifeline of information about a kinfolk dispersed to the far corners of the vast earth. Indeed, many people of my generation can still recall a time when our parents and grandparents carried the Jewish newspaper around with them for most of the day, twice-folded and coddled under their arm. Until it was fully read, it was not put down...

"Today, print and radio may in fact be the last places people turn to for their news. In the blink of an eye, information now travels by electronic impulse and computer byte into the very heavens of space and back.The vast earth has been brought into our living rooms and onto our display terminals.

"It may, therefore, be exceedingly unrealistic and sentimental to hope that The Canadian Jewish News becomes a coddled treasure under the arms of its readers. Nevertheless, it is my aspiration for The CJN that our readers, as their parents and grandparents before them, will look upon the paper as a precious lifeline of information about a kinfolk dispersed to the four corners of the earth."

To this aspiration let me add also the hope that our readers will regard the newspaper as a source of interesting, occasionally provocative, occasionally inspiring reading about the unique values, customs, traditions and heritage which tie our far-flung people together, not only in crisis but in celebration as well.

If we succeed, perhaps every now and then, one or more of our readers will discover that incomparably exhilarating, deeply satisfying feeling, to paraphrase John Updike, of sailing within Judaism's open seas, rather than, unschooled and uninformed, hugging closely its remote, often perplexing, seemingly uninviting shoreline.

Regardless of the measure of our success, however, The CJN commitment to our readers for the coming year will remain uncompromised: to always do our best to be "an independent community newspaper serving as a forum for diverse viewpoints." MBD

Chabad Teen Club to open clubhouse

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Chabad Teen Club (CTC), run out of Chabad Lubavitch of Markham congregation, acquired its new name and a new youth leader in September, and is now gearing up to open its own clubhouse.

The clubhouse – which will serve as an after-school drop-in centre, with amenities including a donated ping-pong table — will be on synagogue property. Rabbi Meir Gitlin, youth director, expects it to open in the next few months. The date depends on completion of the new synagogue building on Green Lane.

The teen club was renamed and launched as a new entity in September both to revitalize it and to distinguish it from the shul's Chabad Youth Club for youngsters from ages 6 to 12.

The club has a mailing list of about 200, almost half of whom have come out to programs, estimated Zev Herman, 20, the club's youth leader and a second-year Business Administration student at York University. Most of the participants attend public high schools, but there are also some day school students. Membership is open to all Jewish youth.

For Jarred Schneider, a 14-year-old Thornlea Secondary School student who has been involved with CTC since September, a weekend Shabbaton in Montreal was a highlight. The forty-three Toronto-area students from here were billeted with families, attended services and joined teenagers affiliated with Chabad in Montreal for a skiing outing. The CTC has a "loose" affiliation with all Chabad clubs, Herman explained.

"They had such a blast...but at the same time they experienced an Orthodox Shabbat," he added.

"I learned a lot," said Jarred, who also attends the club's Sunday morning tefillin club and a weekly CTC-related Jewish issues club at his school. The Jewish issues club is a discussion group focused on topics such as Jewish holidays as well as current news issues from a Jewish perspective.

The teen club is "a worthwhile program, and a lot of fun," said Jarred.

Other recent programs have included High Holiday services a three-day camping trip and a Sukkot meal at the home of Rabbi Abraham Plotkin, spiritual leader of the synagogue. Upcoming events include a talent show and a movie night.

Future plans include greater community involvement through visits to hospital patients and retirement home residents.

The club aims to provide "an opportunity to learn and to grow, and be in an atmosphere of fun," said Rabbi Gitlin. "We like to mix the social together with the educational and inspirational. That's part of our goal: to inspire the kids to feel belonging and commitment."

Kruger to head Jewish Campus Services

TORONTO – Dr. Arthur Kruger has been appointed Chair of UJA Federation's Jewish Campus Services (JCS).

"His track record and his impeccable reputation made him the obvious choice," noted JCS executive director Zac Kaye who added that Kruger's determination and sense of equity has improved Jewish life on campus for 30 years.

Kruger will be guiding a 21-member board, with a mandate to serve over 15,000 students at York, U of T., Ryerson Polytechnic University and Seneca College.

Kruger, a retired economics professor and the University of Toronto's first Jewish Dean of Arts & Science, was instrumental in developing policies to prohibit exam scheduling on religious holidays. He also served as principal of Woodsworth College for part- time students and headed the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education.

As chair of Jewish Campus Services, Kruger will work with board members and staff on fundraising to complement UJA Federation's allocation and to improve programming, both on and off the campus.

Arthur Kruger

Kruger estimates that JCS needs $1 million annually in order to properly serve the Greater Toronto Area's Jewish students.

JCS, through its separate student organizations, is responsible for events such as lectures, Shabbat dinners, dances and film nights.

"If you don't make the Jewish connection with students on campus," cautioned Kruger, "it becomes extremely difficult once they leave."

Kosher frozen meals available for home delivery

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the first time, kosher frozen meals are available for home delivery throughout Ontario.

This new service is a response by Meals on Wheels and other home support agencies, which have had to increase their meal delivery service because of hospital cutbacks, winter weather and the growing senior population.

The kosher frozen meal preparation has been contracted to Peter Graben Fine Foods, which is glatt kosher under the supervision of the Kashruth Council of Toronto, and is distributed through Private Recipes, the caterer for the frozen food service of Meals on Wheels throughout Ontario.

Cost is $5.25 per meal, and participants can order in multiples. The low price is a reflection of government subsidies.

All entrées are packaged in plastic containers, and can be heated in either conventional or microwave ovens. Directions, product names and ingredients are in large print, to accommodate poor eyesight.

Choices include beef stroganoff, chicken breast tarragon, veal stew, grilled salmon, pasta primavera, roast beef and roast turkey, and are accompanied by one starch and one vegetable serving.

Each entree provides 400 calories and over 40 percent of the daily protein requirements for men and women over 75 years of age. The meals are lactose free and are suitable for most special diets, including diabetic. Sodium content is limited to 660 milligrams.

This service is not for the elderly only. It can be used, for example, by those just released from the hospital, who find it difficult to shop and cook, or for those who cannot get out to shop because of injury or illness.

To receive prepared kosher frozen meals, or for other special diet requirements, contact your local Meals on Wheels or home support agencies. If you do not yet receive kosher meals, you can contact Private Recipes directly at 1-800-268-8199.

Volunteer brings joy to hospital patients

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Some 150 patients at the Hospital for Sick Children were assured a merry Christmas thanks to the efforts of an Orthodox Jew.

Jack Schwartz, accompanied by his wife Rose and several friends, went from room to room this season visiting children who were too ill to go home for the holidays.

For the past four years, Schwartz and his helpers have wished patients a speedy recovery and good wishes for the holiday season and have given each a stuffed toy.

Recognizing members of a Jewish family, Schwartz asked if they would like him to make a misheberach (prayer for a speedy recovery). He took out his siddur and recited the blessings.

One of Schwartz's helpers this year was his nephew, Dr. Jonathan Fine,who is currently on sabbatical from Bar Ilan University and doing cancer research at the hospital.

When handing a toy to the the 11-year-old son of Russian immigrants the boy's father placed his hands over his eyes to let the volunteers know the boy is blind.

Schwartz's wife, Rose, who recently had a liver transplant, spoke to transplant patients, and told them how successful her surgery had been. Schwartz says it was his wife's idea to distribute gifts to the children.

Active in many communal groups

Schwartz, a retired textile distributor, is active in many communal organizations. As part of his volunteer work for Jewish Family and Child Service, he serves as lay chaplain at the Toronto and Doctors Hospitals and often visits patients at Princess Margaret and Mount Sinai hospitals after synagogue on Sabbath.

Most of the toys collected this year were donated by Sam Ganz, president of a company that manufactures stuffed animals and toys.

Na'amat helps to stem violence

TORONTO — In October, 110 Na'amat Canada members participated in a mission tour of Israel. The trip was also combined with the Eleventh Triennial Convention and a National Leadership Seminar.

The official opening of the $1 million Na'amat Canada/Glickman Centre for Prevention of Violence in the Family was a highlight of the trip. The centre is unique, a refuge for battered women and children whose address is known to the males from whom they are fleeing. While the shelter itself is a locked, secure facility, the attached counselling unit is open to men: a place where families can receive the treatment they require to function collectively again.

A project three years in the making, the centre was funded by Na'amat Canada membership, in conjunction with the Tel Aviv foundation. "We have always worked towards the care of our children and well-being of Jewish women," says Erika Bloom, who was installed as national president at the convention.

To ensure Na'amat Canada's continued growth, a young leadership seminar was held. Some 20 women, new leaders from across Canada, were involved. "The future of the organization relies on the leadership we develop." Bloom says, "For young leaders, seeing Na'amat in action helps them understand what the cause is all about. As these are all bright, talented individuals, all we have done is show them how to best hone their skills."

Hebron

As of this writing, agreement still eludes Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) over the IDF's redeployment from Hebron. Despite the personal involvement at "the highest levels" of Prime Minister Netanyahu and Chairman Yasser Arafat for more than five hours late into the early morning hours last weekend, their signatures did not appear on final documents.

Apparently, the issues holding back their signatures relate less to the details of the proposed Hebron accord than to the details of what may follow the accord.

According to media reports, Arafat wants a commitment now from Israel specifying three precise dates on which further troop withdrawals from the rest of the West Bank will take place. This is a commitment, however, which the prime minister cannot make. Fully seven members of his 18-person coalition cabinet — Limor Livnat, Zvulun Hammer, Yitzhak Levi, Yuli Edelshtein, Rafael Eitan, Ariel Sharon and Benny Begin — have gone on record as saying that they oppose any further withdrawals, after Hebron, from the West Bank. Indeed Edelshtein and Eitan have said they will even vote against the Hebron agreement when it is submitted to the Knesset.

Nor should Netanyahu make such a commitment. The PA must first be held to some reciprocal balance, such as the public, unambiguous and final renunciation of the Palestine Covenant calling for Israel's destruction and the extradition to Israel of a handful of Palestinians wanted in Israel for murder.

Moreover, the September "disturbances" in which PA police fired upon the IDF bitterly proved the importance of waiting a little bit to taste the fruit of confidence-building measures before more "peace produce" is purchased at the PA market.

Whichever course he steers, Netanyhau is under relentless pressure. By the opposition he is excoriated for having tortuously slowed down the pace of the peace process. By his own cabinet he is "politically" taunted. By many of the right-of-centre voters who supported him in the election he is criticized for even negotiating a Hebron pullout. By neighboring states he is villified as a "threat to peace." By the western media he is scorned as the underminer of peace." And from the president of the United States he is receiving clear messages of obvious impatience.

But the prime minister's proclivities for prudence and caution are the appropriate steering mechanisms. As we have written before in this space, peace is both a means and an end, its proving ground tilled with patience, coexistence and cooperation.

According to Steven Rodan of the Jerusalem Post, defence minister Yitzhak Mordechai has recently told the Israeli public that one of his biggest concerns is that Israelis will continue to live under the illusion that true peace is imminently attainable. "What is needed to be understood," the minister was quoted, "is that it will take many years before we get to the stage of repose." Until that special time, he warned, Israel faces an uncertain future which requires from the people high motivation, patriotism, a proven military force and tenacity. To that list he could have added the highest degree possible of social and national unity.

U.S. President Bill Clinton has invited Netanyahu and Arafat to Washington for that last negotiating "push" that might get their signatures onto the paper. Netanyahu need not resist the president's invitation. He need only resist that gentle "push." Though welcome and comforting, it is not the feel of the hand of the American administration on his back that will instil him with confidence, but rather the feel of the support of the majority of the people of Israel.

Dry Bones

This Week in Canadian Jewish History

Jan. 9, 1872 Rabbi Abraham de Sola of Montreal's Shearith Israel Conregation, opened the session of the U.S. Congress with a prayer. He was the first Jew to be so honored. (Canadian Jewish Congress Archives)

Life sentence, not marriage, Pollard issue

I have visited Jonathan Pollard a number of times in his federal prison. I have spent countless hours in personal conversations as well as in telephone communications wherein his expressions of remorse and his desire not to be a hero but rather to live his life with his loved ones is, in fact, his single focused message.

It is of little interest to me whether or not Esther Pollard was married in Butner, N.C., and duly recorded or not. What is of primary importance to the broad Jewish community and to people of goodwill worldwide, is that the severity of sentence does not compare to any given to even those who have spied on behalf of an enemy — let alone an ally. He has spent over 12 years in prison and has experienced continuous remorse for his illegal and grievous activities on behalf of the State of Israel.

No public school system in Newfoundland

I refer to The CJN, Nov. 28, "Schools funded outside Ontario."

Your comment, "Newfoundland: All school systems — public and denominational are equally funded" is misleading.

Although all schools are funded by the province, they are established on a denominational basis, controlled by seven Christian denominations. The province does not have a public school system similar to that found in other Canadian provinces. Therefore, it is difficult to make a direct comparison of funding of the Newfoundland school system with those of other provinces.

I am searching for Wolkowicz family members who survived the Holocaust. I am a Wolkowicz both by ancestry and marriage. My family came from Kolo in Poland and I have discovered that they were a very large family. There were so many Wolkowiczes in Kolo that I did not believe they all perished. My branch went to England (where the spelling of the name changed) and I have recently found another branch in New Jersey. The Kolo yizkor book shows that a number of Wolkowiczes went to Canada and I would like to make contact with them.

Flatowicz kin in Canada

I am a Holocaust survivor and most of my family were killed, but I am looking for kin. My family was born in Brznica Kolo Radomsko, Poland. My parents' names were Joseph and Manya Flatowitcz. My brothers and sisters were Moshe, Chaim, Chaya, Shimin, Rivka, Rachel and Pinchas Flatowitcz.

Last week, we published Part 1 of an article discussing where the Jules Deschênes report on war criminals has led the Canadian government since it was delivered 10 years ago. This week we publish the conclusion.

By ARNOLD FRADKIN

On Jan. 19, 1995, The Canadian Jewish News reported a war crimes investigation unit representative as saying that the unit had given up laying criminal charges and instead would be focussing on the deportation and denaturalization remedy. The representative was further cited as saying that given the difficulties in proving a criminal case, as identified by the Supreme Court in the Imre Finta decision in March 1994, criminal prosecutions were no longer viable.

At the end of January 1995, denaturalization proceedings against three persons and deportation proceedings against a fourth were instituted. The Toronto Star on Jan. 31, 1995 reported that the Justice and Citizenship ministers were expected to announce that over the next two or three years Canada could move to deport as many as four other war crimes suspects, depending upon the success of the first four cases, and that the War Crimes Unit was still investigating 12 other suspects.

The reaction by Jewish groups to this announcement was reported as one of "tremendous anger." The Globe and Mail report the next day contained Justice Minister Allan Rock's explanation that the government would try to remove at least 12 suspects but that the four cases would be taken as test cases first to establish precedents that would help clear the way for subsequent cases. The Jewish groups were concerned that by the time these four cases worked their way through the courts, the suspects and witnesses in the other eight cases could die of old age. They believed that the Federal Court judgment in the denaturalization case of Jacob Luitjens and his subsequent deportation provided sufficient precedents and urged that all 12 cases be commenced.

The four individuals were Ericks Tobias, 84, Helmut Oberlander, 72, Johann Dueck, 76, Joseph Nemsila, 82. Proceedings against the first three were by way of denaturalization and the fourth by deportation.

Shortly after these proceedings were started, newspaper reports broke the story that Canada had been aware over 30 years ago that Tobias was an alleged Nazi war criminal living in Canada. On March 24, 1995 both the Globe and Mail and the Toronto Star reported that the Canadian Jewish Congress had released a copy of a letter written June 13, 1966 by Simon Wiesenthal to Canadian officials giving Tobias' address in Toronto and listing allegations which were now part of the denaturalization proceedings against him. On April 21, 1995 both the Montreal Gazette and the Ottawa Citizen reported that Canada had known for more than 35 years that Nemsila was living in Canada. The Communist government of Czechoslovakia had requested Nemsila's extradition in 1958 and in1959 but both requests had been turned down.

In May 1995, a fifth deportation proceeding was instituted against Antonas Kenstavicius.

Aside from Kenstavicius, no trial dates for these individuals have as yet been set. What happened instead was the following:

With respect to the three denaturalization proceedings, the government brought pretrial motions in each case to obtain directions from the Federal Court. The three individuals in turn filed motions for disclosure by the government of certain documents. On June 30, 1995, six months after proceedings had been instituted, Associate Chief Justice Jerome, who was responsible for the cases, ordered that all three cases be joined for the purpose of the motions. Shortly afterward, the individuals brought further motions to stay the denaturalization proceedings.

Thus three sets of pre-trial motions for each of the cases were now before the Court: the government's motion for directions, and the two defence motions for better disclosure and for a stay of proceedings. Trial dates for the cases were not set because the motions had to be resolved first.

The parties appeared in court on Dec. 12, 1995 to argue the motions. On that day, almost a year after the proceedings were first initiated, the argument on only the first motion began. But it could not be concluded in one day. Continuation of the argument on only the first of the three motions was set for May 15 and 16, 1996, almost six months later.

Thus, about a year and a half had passed since proceedings were instituted. But no trial dates were set for any of the cases; nor had the argument been concluded on only the first of the three motions.

On March 1, 1996, Assistant Deputy Attorney General Thompson, in charge of civil litigation, met with Chief Justice Julius A. Isaac of the Federal Court. Correspondence was exchanged between them on the same day. In his letter to the chief justice, the assistant deputy attorney general made reference to his statement during the meeting that the attorney general was going to be asked to consider bringing the issues raised in the three motions to the Supreme Court of Canada "because the Federal Court Trial Division is unable or unwilling to proceed with the subject cases expeditiously." He pointed out that a crucial witness in the Tobias case was seriously ill and might not be able to testify and that in the Dueck case one key witness had died and two others were seriously ill. He expressed concern that "if these cases are not dealt with expeditiously they will never be heard on the merits" and went on to say that it was likely that 12 similar cases would be brought to the Federal Court with as many as six cases being instituted that year.

The chief justice's reply stated that he had spoken to Jerome and both were "prepared to take all reasonable steps possible to avoid a reference to the Supreme Court." He went on to say that Jerome had said that "he did not fully appreciate until he read your letter, the urgency of dealing with these matters as expeditiously as the government would like. However, now that he is aware he will devote one week from May 15 to deal with these cases not only with respect to the preliminary points but also with respect to the merits. Finally he has authorized me to say that additional cases of this class coming into the Court will be given the highest priority in light of the concerns experienced in your letter."

Defence counsel were not advised of this meeting nor did they receive a copy of the March 1, 1996 correspondence until approximately a week later. Then a series of correspondence ensued between the parties and on April 30, 1996 they appeared before Jerome to decide how to proceed with the cases. Both sides agreed that Jerome should stay on to hear the motions, including a new motion to stay proceedings because of the intervention by the Assistant Deputy Attorney Council. Jerome decided to turn the cases over to another judge, Mr. Justice Cullen.

Cullen delivered his judgment on July 4, 1996, on the issue of whether the proceedings against the three individuals should be stopped. He ordered the denaturalization proceedings to be stayed. He said that what had happened on March 1, 1996 was "patently wrong" and that judicial independence had been impaired to such a degree that a stay was required. He went on to say that he could not "conclude that the cases were progressing unusually slowly."

His decision met with a mixed reaction. For example the July 7, 1996 editorial in the Toronto Star said justice was not served by stopping these cases from proceeding. The July 5, 1996 editorial in the Ottawa Citizen, on the other hand, called the stay of proceedings a high price for justice which was "worth paying." The July 8, 1996 editorial in the Globe and Mail also lauded Cullen's decision, The Jewish community, however, was unanimous in their outrage. Irving Abella asked Canadians to "picture the outrage they would have felt had multiple killers Paul Bernardo or Clifford Olson been freed simply because a lawyer asked a judge to speed their cases along" (Globe, July 5, 1996).

On July 9, 1996 the government announced that it would appeal Cullen's decision. It also announced its intention to bring six more proceedings for denaturalization.

Subsequently, in a report prepared for the Justice Department, former chief justice Charles Dubin of the Ontario Court of Appeal concluded that Thomson has made an error in judgment when he met with Isaac but that he was motivated by concerns over "inordinate delays." Dubin pointed out that "over a period of 13 months, only one day had been allocated to hear argument and that has permitted only a portion of the argument to be heard on one of the three motions pending, all of which were preliminary to the revocation proceedings themselves."

On Oct. 9, 1996, a three member panel of the Canadian Judicial Council's Conduct Committee concluded that Isaac acted properly in speaking to Jerome after the Department of Justice raised concerns about court delays. It also concluded that there was no improper conduct in Issac's meeting with Thompson about delays. It did however, find that the wording of Isaac's letter and his failure to provide notice of the discussions to all the parties was inappropriate, but not serious. The Cullen decision is now awaiting its appeal.

Meanwhile, with respect to the deportation proceedings against Nemsila, the defence brought a motion saying that the law at the relevant time did not allow deportation of immigrants who had acquired domicile in Canada. The Immigration Adjudicator accepted that argument; the proceedings to deport him were stayed. This ruling was appealed and was argued before Jerome of the Federal Court in Dec. 1995 and Jan. 1996. He reserved judgment. Nemsila then sought an order to stay the proceedings which was argued in July 1996. Mr. Justice Rouleau refused the request for a stay of proceedings, leaving the way open for Jerome's decision on the domicile argument. On Aug. 23, 1996 Jerome ruled that the Immigration Adjudicator had made a mistake in law. He ordered Nemsila be brought before another deportation hearing. That decision was appealed and is scheduled to be heard on Jan. 10, 1997.

On July 17, 1996, a new denaturalization proceeding was filed with the Federal Court against Wasily Bogutin, 87, of Toronto. On Oct. 31, 1996 two further denaturalization proceedings were filed with the Federal Court against Vladmir Katruik, 75, and Ladislaus Csizsik-Csatary, 82, of Montreal.

There are two other cases, namely Rudolph and Kalejs, but they involve alleged Nazi war criminals who have or are presently attempting to enter Canada, not those who are here as citizens or permanent residents.

Thus, the tally of proceedings instituted by the Canadian government in the ten years since the Deschênes Commission Report of Dec. 30, 1986 recommended that 224 cases be investigated and that 20 cases be given urgent attention as follows:13 proceedings were undertaken and only one has resulted in the denaturalization and deportation of a war criminal from Canada.

Arnold Fradkin was one of the founding members of the War Crimes Litigation Unit in the Department of Justice which was formed in 1987 after the Deschênes Commission released its report on the existence of Nazi War Criminals in Canada. He was lead counsel in the case against Jacob Luitjens.

Opinion

Countering Christian missionaries

The Atlantic Jewish Council's biannual convention took place in December. Among the many issues discussed was counter-missionaries.

By Viva Press in Halifax

I never realized how important the conversion of Jews to Christianity is to a Christian. Of course, I had heard of such groups as Jews for Jesus, but the magnitude of this conversion never really affected me —that is, until I met Julius Ciss.

Ciss is the head of the Toronto chapter of Jews for Judaism. He "converted" to Christianity, but the inconsistencies between the Christian Bible and the Hebrew Bible drove him back to Judaism. Ciss is now working to save other Jews who are involved in Christianity and bring them back into the Jewish fold.

Listening to Ciss talk about his experiences was very interesting. But what got me really thinking was why I wouldn't be able to refute some of the things a missionary might say.

Ciss said that most of the Jews who have "converted" to Christianity, are those who grew up with a very limited Jewish background. I had a Jewish day school education. I went to Jewish summer camps. I observe the holidays. So, why all of a sudden was I feeling ignorant?

I realized that while I know the fundamental differences between Christianity and Judaism, at that moment I didn't really know how to answer Bible-quoting Christians. My knowledge of the two testaments is not good enough to win a showdown. But the few key points Ciss stressed are enough to help anyone out of a potential confrontation.

The basic premise upon which Christianity rests is the belief that Jesus is the Messiah predicted by the Hebrew Bible. Judaism has always rejected this belief. So Christians feel compelled to convince Jews that Jesus did fulfil the requirements of the promised Messiah. If he didn't, then Christianity is based on a false fact.

The following are some of the Jews' criteria for the Messiah: The Messiah must be Jewish; he must be a member of the tribe of Judah and a direct descendant of King David and King Solomon.

Jews believe that he will gather the Jewish people from exile and return them to Israel; he will rebuild the Jewish Temple in Jerusalem; he will bring world peace; he will influence the entire world to acknowledge and to serve one God. If an individual fails to fulfil even one of these conditions or responsibilities, then he can't be the Messiah.

Jesus was Jewish. Beyond that he failed to fulfil any of the other criteria. His genealogy is questionable. The Christians believe that the third, fourth, fifth and sixth criteria will be fufilled in a Second Coming. However, the concept of the Messiah coming twice has no scriptural foundation in Judaism.

So, according to Judaism, Jesus is not the Messiah. The missionaries will ask the potential Jewish convert a lot of questions until the Jew falters. They will misquote our Bible, take passages out of context, mistranslate, and give "proofs" showing how the Hebrew Bible prophesies the comings of Jesus. But if every Jew remembers these few points on why Jesus is not the Messiah, she or he will be able to fend off the missionary.

According to Ciss, there are over 600 different missionary groups that spend more than $200 (US) million worldwide for the purpose of converting Jews each year. There are over 50 such groups in Canada.

So that the Jews to whom their proselytizing is directed won't feel uncomfortable, they call themselves Messianic Jews instead of Christians. They wear Jewish symbols including tallitot and kippot. They call their church a Messianic Synagogue. Jesus is referred to as "Yeshua Hamashiach." These misrepresentations are designed to allay the feelings of guilt of prospective Jewish converts who find the terminology of "Christian" too alienating.

Ciss's group, Jews for Judaism, helps keep Jews Jewish. The Christian missionaries cannot succeed as long as Jews can refute the claim that Jesus is the Messiah for the Jews. If we continue to disprove this claim, Jews will remain Jews in the Jewish faith.

Unity badly needed in the Jewish world

Two months ago, I stood at the corner of a four-way intersection. To my right was a gathering of Jewish people demonstrating its support for the Middle East peace process and its dissatisfaction with the current Netanyahu adminisration. To my left was another group of Jews responding to the group on my right. They were supportive of the Netanyahu government.

By Justin Korda in Montreal

Across the street in front of me was yet a third demonstration, of Palestinian Arabs who had gathered to protest the Israeli "occupation" of their land and the "injustices" being experienced by their people.

This was the scene that I witnessed in Seattle, Wash., one evening, when I attended the Council of Jewish Federations' annual General Assembly, outside the covention centre.

I watched in sorrow as this microcosm of divided Diaspora Jewry turned on itself. I couldn't help but be frightened about the old saying, "United we stand, divided we fall." But how far can this old saying be taken? Doesn't freedom of speech and pluralism outweigh the need for total unity?

As pondered these questions, I recalled a statement by the late Yitzhak Rabin. On the day that he shook hands with Arafat on the White House lawn, he referred to Eccelesiates, saying, "There is a time and place for everything." But are the streets of Seattle the proper time or the proper place for Diaspora Jewry to rally against each other in the face of a Palestinian demonstration opposed to both of their common values.

The murder of Yitzhak Rabin sparked much controversy within the Jewish world over the nature of legitimate debate concerning the peace process. The assassination was an alarm stirring us to understand that the issues which divide us cannot override the fundamental forces that unite us. Unfortunately, though, this alarm seems to have been muted lately.

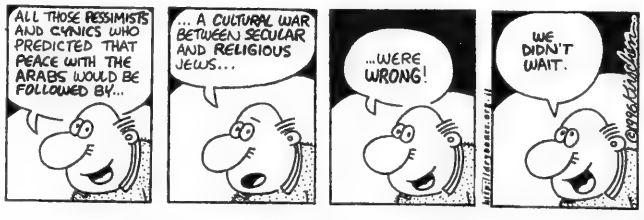
Prior to 1948, there were many different ideological visions among Zionist leaders. These visions, although different, did possess a common goal, a common aspiration. When the State of Israel was proclaimed, Jews everywhere rejoiced.

With the assassination of Rabin, this feeling of being one nation has descended to its lowest point. Following the murder, a feeling of unity was urgently needed, but was sorely missing. And it was this same feeling that was absent on the street in Seattle that evening.

There still is room for pluralism and difference of opinion; however, more room must be "allocated" for the historical religious and other forces which unite us.

Much of the debate within the Jewish people today revolves around the issues of Jewish observance, continuity and Zionism. Throughout the debate, though, we Jews must never forget to ask ourselves why we debate these issues at all. The answer is that we have a common interest and it is this common interest that makes the Jewish people an energized nation.

At Mount Sinai, the Jewish people celebrated one nation. During the Holocaust, the Jewish people suffered as one nation. In 1948, the Jewish people were triumphant as one nation. Today, we must recognize that the fundamental forces that unite us as a nation, are much stronger than the issues that divide us. This realization is essential to enable us to stand together, again, as one nation.



ALL THOSE PESSIMISTS AND CYNICS WHO PREDICTED THAT PEACE WITH THE ARABS WOULD BE FOLLOWED BY...
... A CULTURAL WAR BETWEEN SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS JEWS...
...WERE WRONG!
WE DIDN'T WAIT.

Dry Bones

The King of Shnorrers

It was almost 100 years ago that Israel Zangwill wrote his famous little book The King of Shnorrers. It was one of Dad's favorites and he gave it to me to read when I was young. I have never forgotten its message.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The hero of the tale was a professional shnorrer, who knew that giving ranked high on the list of mitzvot, and that every good Jew has a sense of guilt when someone asks for money and is turned away. The King of Shnorrer's technique was so superb that he rarely received the cold shoulder.

Recently, along with 100 requests for supporting worthy organizations, I received a little booklet entitled, All hail to a Prince of a Schnorrer. The person referred to was the late professor Jacob Rader Marcus, acknowledged to have been the foremost historian of American Jewry, who died earlier this year at the age of 99.

He was also the founder of the American Jewish Archives, located in Cincinnati, which is the prime repository of archival American Jewish material. Once a year he used to send out a letter, and his notes had such incomparable charm that their success was a foregone conclusion. Now that Marcus is dead, his successor at the archives has put some of his shnorr letters into an illustrated pamphlet. It is a joy to read and brings back the memorable personality of the writer.

Here is one example: "Some of my disciples begged to continue sending out my annual schnorr letter. They tell me that my letters make them smile. But I have no desire to be funny. Archival science and history are serious disciplines... I have never consciously set out to be funny. I can fully appreciate the indignation of one of my clients who righteously insisted that I allow him the privilege of disliking to give. 'Don't make me enjoy it,' he wrote. 'It may set a dangerous precedent.'

"Anyhow, it's a sublime profession I've been devoting myself to at the Archives. I hear that distinguished neurosurgeons demand $20,000 to transplant the brain of a archivist. The brain of an engineer costs only $500; the brain of a rabbi can be had for $1,000...

"In these days of economic detente, we should take market conditions into consideration. The Denver Zoological Foundation, seeking inmates for its new primate house, offers to name a gorilla in honor of a donor who puts up $4,900. A chimpanzee may be named in honor of a friend for $850, a baboon for $190.

"Here is our archival post-holiday offer, especially tailored for you. Even though most of you are surely more advanced as primates, the American Jewish Archives will do better than the Denver Zoo. We will name a project after you for less money. We figure you're as good as a baboon no matter what your Board thinks of you.

With all respect and affection I am, as ever, Jacob R. Marcus."

It is my understanding that the response was almost 100 percent. There was only one baboon who did not give!

"Jake" as we called him, is now gone, but his books and his shnorr letters survive him.

Magda Trocme, a Holocaust heroine, was the leader of a rescue movement in the southern French village of Le Chambon-sur-Lignon which saved the lives of about 3,500 Jews. Trocme, a pacifist, professed not to understood why her goodness and her courage were applauded. She was the subject of a book, Lest Innocent Blood Be Shed, and of a documentary film, Weapons of the Spirit.

Samuel Toledano, the dominant figure in Spain's Jewish community for many years, played an integral role in the promulgation of two government decrees (1967 and 1992) which gave Jews equal rights with Catholics and paved the way for the construction of the first synagogue in Spain since the Inquisition.

Raphael Patai, a cultural anthropologist born in Budapest, wrote almost 40 books on Jewish and Arab culture, history, politics, folklore and psychology. The recipient of the Hebrew University's first doctorate degree, Patai was the author of The Arab Mind, The Jewish Mind, The Myth of the Jewish Race and Myth and Legend of Ancient Israel.

Jules Davids, a scholar specializing in American diplomatic history, helped a bedridden John F. Kennedy write Profiles in Courage, an award-winning book that burnished Kennedy's credentials as a national politician worthy of the presidency.

Samuel Brownstein, a Brooklyn biology teacher, assisted millions of North American high school seniors study for the dreaded Scholastic Aptitude Test. He and Mitchel Weiner co-wrote Barron's How to Prepare for the S.A.T. and a host of related works that are still in print after more than 40 years.

Rabbi Elmer Berger was for decades a major personality in the American Council for Judaism, an anti-Zionist group that opposed Israel's establishment.

Paul Erdos, a Hungarian mathematician of the first rank and the epitome of an eccentric professor, was called the "prince of problem solvers." A prolific monographist and a wandering lecturer, he founded the field of discrete mathematics and was one of the pioneers of computer science.

Our place in nature

BY RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Tu b'Shvat, the New Year of the Trees is approaching and once again we ponder the significance of our place within nature. However, it is not all of nature which we celebrate, but specifically the trees.

Humanity has a very real, physical dependence upon the trees. By simply existing, trees provide the oxygen essential to our lives. One could say that we inhale what the trees exhale — they breathe life into our world. This alone would merit a celebration of the trees. But could there be a symbolic message underlying this holiday?

Rabbinic literature has two interesting narratives concerning the trees. The first is an explicit command that if one is planting a tree and hears that the Messiah has arrived, one must finish planting the tree and only then go and greet the Messiah. Clearly the importance of planting the tree is underlined, since it takes precedence over welcoming the person for whom we have waited since the dawn of time.

The second rabbinic narrative concerns a sage named Choni Hama'agel, who was known as the greatest of Torah interpreters. One day he came upon a man planting a carob tree, a tree that does not bear fruit for 70 years. Choni asked the man planting the tree if he was certain that he would live to partake of its fruit.

The man responded: "The whole world is like a carob tree; my ancestors planted for me and I am planting for my children."

Choni sat down, fell asleep and slept for 70 years. Upon awakening, he saw a man picking the fruit from the carob tree and he inquired if this was the same man who planted the tree. The man responded that it was his grandfather who had planted the tree.

The story of Choni and the carob tree speaks of a person's investment. The man planting the tree knew he would not live to enjoy its fruits, but he planted nonetheless. In stating that the world is a carob tree, the man is acknowledging that the world could not function if not for the investments of those who came before us. He feels himself obligated to plant the seeds for the future, uncertain but hopeful that his investment will provide nourishment for those to follow.

Within nature, humanity has a special connection to the trees, for their lifetimes span several of ours. The trees become the physical connection to our past and they embody our hopes for a safe future. When we look upon a forest, we do not see only the beauty of nature in its glory, we also see those people who lived before us and to whom we owe the very air we breathe.

It is easy to understand why even the Messiah must await his greeting until we have completed our obligation to the seeds we must sow.

Locating lost relatives

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Letters from the Roots & Remembrance mailbag:

Louis Laufert of Markham, Ont. writes seeking advice on researching his family tree. Laufert was born in Rouen, France. His father was born in Zloczew, near Lodz, his mother (née Katzko) in Sieradz, also near Lodz. His family was arrested by the Gestapo and deported to concentration camps, where his mother and sister perished. He never knew any other family members in Poland, especially since they probably did not survive the Holocaust. He believes he has some cousins in Israel. He is married to Tony Edelman and has four married children and nine grandchildren, all interested in their roots.

Even from this limited amount of information, it is clear that the Laufert's have many research avenues open to them. Yad Vashem's Hall of Names (P.O. Box 3477, Jerusalem 91034 Israel), which has some three million pages of testimony in its archives, will do a generic surname search by mail at a reasonable cost. Pages of testimony, which provide details on Holocaust victims, were usually supplied by living relatives whose names and addresses are also given.

However, since many pages of testimony were submitted in the 1950s, the researcher may need assistance tracing a particular submitter who may be related. The best bet is to contact the Search Bureau for Missing Relatives (P.O. Box 92, Jerusalem; fax 2- 202730). Utilizing a data base of more than one million names, the bureau's Batya Unterschatz has an excellent track record at finding relatives living in Israel, including the cousins of Russian olim arriving in recent years.

Alexander Beider's Dictionary of Jewish Surnames From The Kingdom of Poland (Avotaynu, 1996) links the surname Laufert to the town of Sieradz and connects the etymology to the Polish word for "tramp" or "rover." The dictionary indicates that the surname Kaczko comes from the Polish word for "duck" and was found in Sieradz and a few other nearby towns.

Nineteenth-century Jewish records in handwritten Polish are readily available at low cost for many towns of Russian-Poland through the Mormon LDS Family History Library in Salt Lake City and its network of branches. A quick scan of the LDS catalogue shows that it possesses some five reels of microfilmed Jewish records of births, marriages and deaths for Zloczew between the years 1826 and 1872. (Records from the period 1808 to 1825 may be mixed in with the Roman Catholic records.) The phone number of the LDS library in Toronto is 416-621-4607.

The Encyclopedia Judaica's entry on Sieradz indicates that the town had a Jewish street as early as 1446, that its Jewish population swelled and then declined to a low of 17 in 1765, then rose again to nearly 5,000 (about 40 percent of the total population) before World War II. The Jews "earned their livelihood from trade in cereals, shopkeeping, tailoring, weaving, carpentry, and haulage." Through Nazi brutality, looting, ghettoization and deportations, the community was entirely wiped out by August 1942.

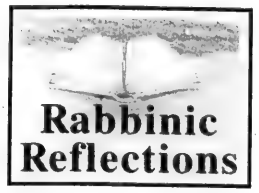
A yizkorbuch or memorial book for Zloczew is available from select Jewish and university libraries. Written in Hebrew and Yiddish, Sefer Zloczew was published in Tel Aviv in 1971 by a committee of the town's former residents, many of whom (or their children) may still be around to tell the Lauferts what they remember of their family.

Space limitations unfortunately prevent description of more research avenues open for exploration, which are both numerous and promising. One method of getting up-to-date information is to chat with members of the Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada (416-638-3280; [e-mail henry_w@tvo.org]) at the monthly meetings at Sha'arei Shomayim Synagogue. Another is by reading the quarterly journal Avotaynu: The International Review of Jewish Genealogy (P.O. Box 900, Teaneck NJ 07666).

In regard to the Jewish settlement at Wapella in what is now Saskatchewan, Allen Klenman of Victoria, B.C. writes that his grandfather, Abraham Klenman, founded the first Jewish farm settlement there in 1887. He encloses Wapella Farm Settlement, a 50-page tract by Cyril Edel Leonoff with many photographs, including one of Klenman's family taken in Montreal in 1887.

Thanks for the book, which I had not seen before. For readers interested in tracking it down, it was published in 1972 (second edition, 1975) by the Manitoba Historical and Scientific Society in conjunction with the Jewish Historical Society of Western Canada.

Israel's relationship with God



By RABBI AKIVA LUBOW

In the course of normal conversation, people tend to be verbose, repeating themselves, even if they sometimes use different words or terminology. Not so with the Torah. When we read the Torah, each word and even each letter of the Torah teaches us something new.

Therefore, when we read in this week's parshah (Shmot 6:6-7), "Say, therefore, to the people Israel: I am the Lord. I will bring you out from under the burdens of the Egyptians and deliver you from their bondage. I will redeem you with an outstretched arm and through extraordinary chastisements. And I will take you to be My people, and I will be your God," we learn something new with each phrase of these two verses.

In fact, in these two brief verses, God uses four verbs to describe what he is about to do for the people Israel. We read, "I will bring you out...," "...and deliver..." "I will redeem you...," and "I will take you to be My people..." The use of these four verbs provides the basis for drinking four cups of wine at our Pesach seder. I would suggest that rather than being redundant, these four verbs are used to demonstrate a progression in the relationship between God and the people of Israel.

First, God says, "I will bring you out." This is the most elementary level, but it is an act which is necessary before the others will be possible. First the people Israel must experience physical freedom. So long as they live under the burden of slavery, it will be impossible for their relationship with God to grow and develop on a higher level. Then God says I will "deliver you." This is a verb which goes beyond physical freedom. A God who merely brings the people Israel out from slavery can allow them to be taken once again into servitude by capricious Pharaoh who has changed his mind, but a God who delivers His people is a God who will watch over them and protect them as they reach the sea.

Then, we are told, "I will redeem you..." This verb is related to the Hebrew technical term for a person who has the responsibility for ransoming of captives. It is also a verb related to the theme of redemption, and viewing God as the God of Redemption is a central tenet of Judaism. It is a theme which finds itself expressed numerous times in our liturgy, as well. It expresses a special relationship between God and the people Israel throughout all time.

That relationship reaches its pinnacle when we are told, "I will take you to be My people..." This is a phrase which has the legal force of establishing a covenant between God and the people Israel. When God says, "I will take you to be My people," it reminds us of the relationship metaphorically of bride and groom.

These four verbs which we read in this week's parshah establish a progression and an evolution of relationship between God and the people Israel. They speak not just to our ancestors at the time of our redemption from slavery in Egypt, but to our people throughout all generations. They speak not just to the relationship between a God and His people, but to the relationship with God which is available to each of us as individuals as we go about our lives.

Pharmacist beats Ripken's record

By MICHAEL CHARLES
Special to The CJN

Norman Charles

Whenever I think of the fuss that was made over Cal Ripken's consecutive game record of 1,189 games, I have to smile. Anyone who has ever passed Charles Pharmacy in the past 57 years knows they never miss a day without seeing my father, Norman Charles.

Now in his 80s, he has never missed a shift for 17,100 days. Working for him is as natural as breathing and whenever I suggest he take a vacation or a day off, he chides me with the response that "working is my vacation."

To say his store is not located in the toniest part of Toronto would be an understatement. He constantly gets a lot of what he would call "rubbydubs" for customers.

I remember one day when one of his clients came in and handed him a pile of money. My father simply took the small package, lifted up the carriage of the till and neatly put the money away. I never said anything at the time, but I did wonder what was happening. A few days later, the man came into the store again and when my father saw him, he took the money out of the till and handed it back, nothing more said. That is the way it is with my father, a man of very few words whose actions speak for themselves.

As I reconstruct the scene 40 years later in my mind, what I think may have happened was that the man simply could not trust himself with all of that payday cash and gave it to my father for safekeeping. He might have been concerned that he would drink it away.

On the other hand, my father did not act very pleasantly when alcoholics came in to buy rubbing alcohol. I remember him intercepting me once, as I was getting a bottle from the back. He calmly walked to the front of the store and threw the man out. When I asked him why he would turn down a sale, he said the person was an alcoholic and would probably kill himself with that stuff.

It was not the first time I saw may father almost physically throw people he didn't like out of the store. If you could see all 130 pounds of him, you would wonder where he gets his nerve. The customer was not always right in my father's store.

About a year ago, when I went to visit him one night, I asked him why his arm was bruised. He brushed off the question, but my mother told me someone was reaching into the cash register and Dad slammed it shut on him before calling the police. He tends to do things like that.

A woman came in recently with a prescription that he noticed was false. He told her she would have to come back in a few hours because "his computer was down." After she left, he called the police and had them waiting to arrest her when she came back. I don't know where he gets his courage or his sense of justice, but it is all there.

Recently, the government changed procedures and insisted that the 63 remaining pharmacists not on computer change over immediately if they expected to be paid for drugs from the provincial plan. In my father's world, rules are rules. So he simply went about researching which computer and software package to buy and took the appropriate course. This was quite a challenge for someone who still used his original typewriter and could probably sell it as an antique for more than the computer he eventually bought.

As a keen observer of this man for the past 50 years, I only hope I can live up to his standards of integrity, honor and compassion. Maybe I should write Cal and tell him his record has been broken.

Ultra-Orthodox get emergency medical response service

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Like a number of other cities in the world where there are large "frum" communities, Montreal's ultra-Orthodox Jews will soon have their own emergency medical response service.

Hatzoloh, as the service is known, is not intended to replace, but rather supplement, the public Urgences Santé, assisting it in overcoming language or "cultural barriers," said local coordinator Zev Neuwirth. Because its volunteers live and work in the same neighborhood as those who will use the service, Neuwirth believes Hatzoloh will be able to respond more quickly.

Entirely funded and run by the Jewish community, the non-profit, all-volunteer Hatzoloh is expected to be operational by the end of the year.

In Montreal, Hatzoloh will operate on a more limited basis than in, say, New York where it has its own ambulances, because by law Urgences Santé exclusively provides emergency stretcher-bearing transportation, and paramedics are not recognized in Quebec.

Hatzoloh's function will be similar to that of the emergency medical service run by Cote St. Luc and other municipalities, he said. In fact, its volunteers did their field training with the Cote St. Luc service, as well as in the Jewish General Hospital (JGH) emergency ward.

Hatzoloh has 25 emergency medical technicians, all young men, who are to take turns being on call 24 hours a day, seven days a week, including holidays, serving initially the Orthodox communities in Outremont, and later Cote des Neiges and Snowdon.

Neuwirth said the community will be advised to continue to first call 911 in case of medical emergencies, and then Hatzoloh. Its technicians have received 150 hours of theoretical training, in a course approved by the U.S. Department of Transport. Hatzoloh's medical adviser is Dr. Alex Guttman, an emergency room doctor at the JGH.

Volunteers are equipped with a variety of emergency medical equipment, such as an airway management system and trauma care supplies. Like Urgences Santé attendants, Hatzoloh volunteers cannot perform any invasive procedure, such as starting an IV or blood transfusion or medicate, Neuwirth said.

When Urgences Santé arrives on the scene, Hatzoloh will step aside and let it take over, he said. Hatzoloh's role after that will be to assist with any language problems or other misunderstandings. Although Urgences Santé personnel is supposed to speak English, Neuwirth said, in times of crisis, many in these communities can think clearly only in Yiddish, especially the older people. Some also are apprehensive communicating with strange authority figures, he said.

"Although Urgences Santé may do an adequate job of serving the city at large, their huge workload and other priorities may have deprived them of the opportunity to adequately meet the special requirements of the frum Jewish community," an appeal from Hatzoloh states. "We must understand and appreciate that under Urgences Santé's current restraints, there is only so much that it can accomplish...Quite frankly, the Jewish community cannot expect Urgences Santé, which is doing the best job it can, to also serve its special needs."

Hatzoloh intends to offer preventive health and first aid programs in the community.

THE BORINS BEAT

The CJN has a new home and now so does this column. It's great to be back! Sheila Seaton, nee Goldberg, of Beverly Hills who is a subscriber will be happy as will my old friends and CJN Directors, George Cohon and Murray Koffler. This morning I was saddened to hear of George's close friend Earl Walls' passing. Earl was a great Canadian heavyweight champion, a genial real estate broker who touched a lot of people's lives ... a real mensch.

Another reader Sheila Engel got me involved in Reena years ago when my Wheat Sheaf Tavern used to donate Pub Nights for auction. That's how I met Bert and Marilyn Raphael who "won" a party night. I've written many times about how thankful we should be that Bert continues to monitor our daily newspapers and to respond with such zeal. During the last year or so I've also featured the affable Sheila Engel in my columns. My loyal readers will be happy to know she found her "hunk". In fact Dr. Norton Lithwick recently threw a SURPRISE 50th birthday party at Simpatico for her. Ruth Ladovsky of United Bakers fame took great photos. Ira Sack, Flory Lebow, Bob Cohen and Elaine Yaffe regaled us with their stories and genial Jerry Yaffe was the very funny M.C. Harriet and I enjoyed seeing Sheila's great kids Alysa and Josh. Sy and Carrol Eisler as always were great dinner companions. I know you like when I name names. I think I heard Sheila say that it was the first time she knew everyone in a restaurant but having enjoyed many meals with her at United Bakers Dairy Restaurant, La Maison Benoit and Sabatino's, I doubt it. Have a happy year dear friend.

Well, my OBUSFORME (founded in 1980 by my old neighbour Frank Roberts, another Reena supporter) got me through another column. Reena has brought joy and hope to so many families. Wonderful leadership of so many able staff and marvelous volunteers ... I'm thrilled to continue to be a part of Reena.

"Irving Layton has been one of Montreal's and Canada's most flamboyant, outspoken and daring literary figures for close to 60 years," said tribute committee chair Roma Gelblum Bross. "To say that he is part of the literary scene and history of this country and the city would be an understatement. He has made its history."

Layton has been in failing health. The evening will be a chance for fellow writers, friends and family members to share their memories. Layton himself is expected to read from his works.

Centaur director Maurice Podbrey will act as emcee, while Muriel Gold, a former director of the Saidye Bronfman Centre Theatre, will be artistic director. Among the writers who will participate are Michael Harris, David Solway and D.G. Jones.

Born Israel Pincas Lazarovitch in a Romanian village in 1912, Layton came with his family to Montreal a year later. He dropped out of school for a while to work as a pedlar, but later re-entered Baron Byng High School.

He earned a degree in agriculture at Macdonald College and later a master's in political science at McGill University.

In 1940, he began teaching English to immigrants at the Jewish People's Library and at the Jewish Teachers' Seminary. In 1946, he became a teacher of English and British history at Herzliah High School, a career that would last about a decade.

One of his early students, Ethel Roskies, recalled that the brash and exuberant Layton stood out among his colleagues, most of whom were rather dour older Europeans.

"He was not a good teacher in any conventional sense. He was not patient or kind. He fired chalkboard erasers at you if he didn't like your answers. He broke all the rules. We had never seen anything like him."

Layton published close to 1,000 poems and prose pieces in some 50 books, as well as volumes of correspondence and an autobiography. He won a Governor General's Award for poetry in 1959 and was named to the Order of Canada in 1976.

He taught for many years at Concordia University (and its predecessor Sir George Williams) and at Toronto's York University from 1969-78.

The tribute is sponsored by the Quebec Society for the Promotion of English-Language Literature (QSPELL).

Israel will focus on security needs

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Despite U.S. President Bill Clinton's public rebuke of Israel recently, the Jewish State will act in its own interests and continue to expand settlements in order to enhance its security, the secretary-general of world Likud said in an interview.

"The best way to unify Israel, as history has shown, is to put pressure on Israel," said Michael Adari during a visit to Montreal to build support for Herut-Likud.

"The position of U.S. presidents has always been that the settlements are an 'obstacle' to peace, but we cannot afford to look at it through this prism," Adari said.

He suggested as well that any differences with the United States over settlement policy are far outweighed by "mutual" and "common" interests that will not jeopardize the alliance.

Israel's determination to press ahead with new construction is based on Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's commitment to Likud policy – within the legal parametres of the Oslo accords – to expand existing settlements.

A permanent Jewish presence in Hebron "is the essence of what Judaism is all about," Adari said.

Adari also included "reciprocity" by the Palestinians as an essential element to a "real and secure" peace, but he expressed distrust of Yasser Arafat, who, in his view, has not changed his terrorist stripes.

And while differences exist within Herut-Likud over the wisdom of dealing with Arafat, there is complete unity on three main principles: there will never be a Palestinian state or a divided Jerusalem, and settlements will expand.

"For the first time, we have a prime minister who means what he says," Adari said.

Adari said part of his work while travelling has been to clarify the "confusion" and "misunderstanding" of Likud policies in the Diaspora, largely attributable to a weakness in Israel's own hasbarah skills and negative media coverage.

On the other hand, Adari noted, Herut-Likud has always found a more receptive hearing among average members of the Jewish community than it has had from the Jewish "establishment."

He cited the huge support enjoyed by Likud-Herut among average Jews in France, many of them Sephardim, who turned out by the thousands to welcome Netanyahu when he visited the country soon after his election.

Adari hoped to tap some of that same sensibility in Canada, where he said Herut-Likud activities have essentially been in a state of "hibernation."

While in Montreal, Adari spoke at Petach Tikvah Synagogue in St. Laurent and consulted with membership at a briefing at the Beth Israel Beth Aaron synagogue.

Eugene Maiese
runs the creative arts program at the Jewish Home for the Aged, and over 300 residents a week benefit from his creativity and sensitivity. A fine artist trained in New York, for the past 10 years, Eugene has used his talent to encourage the clients at Baycrest. Painted silk scarves, pottery, weaving, stained glass and mosaics blossom from hands tainted with time or illness.

"Working with textures and colours awakens feelings and talents that may have been dormant in a client, sometimes for years. It doesn't matter how impaired the person is, physically or mentally, there's always a person there, and it's up to us to find a way to get through to the love of colour that's inside all of us. This is a wonderful place. For me, it's not a job, it's the most human thing I can do."

This team of staff and volunteers understands the need to create and make something that we can call our own. Adding quality to living.

Calgary's Jewish community continues to thrive

Over the past two decades, the Calgary Jewish community has experienced rapid growth, increasing in size from 3,275 in 1971 to more than 7,000 in 1991. This rapid increase has had significant impact on the character of the community, as shown in a recently released demographic study.

The study reveals that Calgary's Jewish community is relatively young, with lower than average rates of Jewish identification and higher than average rates of intermarriage. The proportion of recent immigrants to the community, particularly from the former Soviet Union, is higher than in other Canadian Jewish communities.

The study, entitled Weaving Diverse Strands: Demographic Challenge Transforming the Fabric of Jewish Communal Life in Calgary, was prepared by James L. Torczyner and Shari L. Brotman of McGill University's Consortium for Ethnicity and Strategic Social Planning, in conjunction with the Council of Jewish Federations-Canada and Calgary's Jewish Community Council.

Through its analysis of the 1991 Canadian census, the study provides important information on the makeup of the Jewish community of Calgary – information that will be useful to communal leadership in reaching future funding decisions on the maintenance, development and expansion of local communal resources, services and institutions.

In the 1991 census, Canadians were asked to identify themselves by religion and by ethic origin. For the purposes of the study, a Jew is defined as "someone who identifies him/herself as being 'Jewish by religion,' or 'Jewish by religion and Jewish by ethnic origin' or 'Jewish by ethnic origin with no religion.' " Excluded from the analysis were those who identified themselves as Jewish by ethnic origin but with a religion other than Jewish.

• Population growth — Calgary's Jewish community has received a high proportion of immigrant Jews to Canada over the last 20 years. One in five Jews in Calgary are recent immigrants who arrived after 1971. This figure is higher than the national average — immigrants make up only 14.8 percent of the national Jewish population. The majority of foreign-born Jewish people who arrived in the last 20 years (62.3 percent) are from the former USSR, another 14.2 percent from Israel.

In 1971, one out of every 100 Calgary Jews was born in the former Soviet Union. Twenty years later, Russian-born Jews comprised one out of every 12 Jewish Calgarians — an increase of 800 percent.

Another factor contributing to Calgary's rapid growth was the influx of Jews from other parts of Canada, especially Quebec, and the simultaneous expansion of Calgary's economy due to the oil boom.

• Children — The number of Jewish children has also risen dramatically. In 1981, there were only 850 Jewish children in Calgary under the age of 10, and they accounted for 15.1 percent of the Jewish population at that time. In 1991, there were 1,185 Jewish children living in Calgary under the age of 10, representing 16.6 percent of the Jewish population.

Calgary's Jewish community has a higher proportion of young persons and middle aged persons (35 to 40) and a lower percentage of elderly persons than other Canadian Jewish centres.

• Patterns of Jewish identification — Only 77.6 percent of Calgary Jews said they identified as Jewish by religion. Only two other centres had lower rates of identification with Jewish as a religion – Edmonton and Vancouver.

The authors of the study believe that two factors may influence the relatively low rates of Jewish identification in Calgary. They write that "it may be that Jews who are less affiliated and less identified are more likely to move to Calgary than those who place a greater importance on living in a community with more Jewish institutional resources ... [at the same time] Calgary Jews who are very committed to Jewish life may encourage their children to leave Calgary and move to a community with a greater Jewish presence."

• Intermarriage Calgary has higher than average intermarriage rates, the fourth highest of all Jewish communities of any size in Canada, following Vancouver, Halifax and Edmonton. One out of every three Jewish children (33.3 percent) lives in a family situation where one parent is not Jewish. Intermarriage is more common among younger Jews, in the 25 to 39 age group.

• Living arrangements — The living arrangements of Jews in Calgary are stable and traditional. The predominant living arrangement is husband-wife families consisting of Jews married to other Jews (over 77 percent). However, 7.2 percent lived in single parent families, with 93.4 percent of these families headed by women.

More children live in husband-wife families in the Jewish community in Calgary than in the general population, but one in 10 Jewish children lived in single-parent families, the majority living with a female single parent.

• Socio-economic status — As stated in the study: "In general, the Jewish community of Calgary has attained higher levels of education, income and participation rates in professional occupations and industries than has the Calgary population as a whole. Consider the following points:

— Twice as many Jews earned $75,000 or more in 1991 as did members of the Calgary population as a whole.

— Sixty percent of all Jews in Calgary were either enrolled in university or had completed at least a bachelor's degree. These rates are twice that of the city's general population.

— Calgary Jewry had a greater percentage of people in professions than the Calgary population as a whole. One out of 20 doctors and dentists in Calgary in 1991 was Jewish, compared to one out of 30 Calgarians generally.

However, the study points out that Calgary Jews are not as well off as Canadian Jews generally. While 7.4 percent of Calgary Jews earned $75,000 and more, 10 percent of Canadian Jews had that level of income.

Jews in Calgary had higher participation rates in several professional occupations in 1991 than did Calgarians in general, including: human services and teaching, accountants, notaries, lawyers and judges, physicians and dentists.

• Poverty among Jews — One out of every six Jews in Calgary, or a total of 1,240, lived below or near the poverty line. This poverty rate is higher than the national Jewish average, but lower than levels among the Calgary population as a whole. Women are more likely to be poor than men and 33.6 percent of all Jewish seniors lived below the poverty line. Almost one in five Jewish children under the age of 14 lived in poverty in 1991.

• The elderly — Almost one in 10 Jews in Calgary are over 65 years of age. This is considerably lower than the national Jewish rate of 17.3 percent. There were 230 Holocaust survivors in 1991, representing 3.2 percent of the Jewish population.

In summing up, the study's authors write: "The factors of intensive Russian Jewish immigration following a period of economic growth and migration of large number of Jews from other parts of Canada, combined with a sharply higher birth rate, has transformed Calgarian Jewish life in a unique way."

This transformation, they write, rasies challenges for community building. These challenges fall into five categories.

• The challenge of rapid growth — Rapid growth creates demands for diverse Jewish institutions and challenges to provide funding to meet the increased demand. Will the community's fund-raising capacity be able to keep pace with the anticipated service demands on it? How ought the community to prioritize the various agenda items? Should emphasis be placed on educational programming, family support or assistance to immigrants and to the poor?

• The challenge of Russian immigration — How well equipped are the Jewish communal agencies to respond to the linguistic and cultural needs of this sizable population group? To what extent are Russian Jewish immigrants becoming integrated into Jewish communal life? Are they represented on decision-making bodies? "Specific efforts will be required to incorporate Russian and other immigrant Jews in community governance and to secure their participation in community fund-raising efforts," states the report.

Beth Tikvah provides hope for the disabled

By WENDY SCHNEIDER
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — If a family can be defined as a group of people who share a dwelling and a commitment to one another, then Beth Tikvah would surely qualify.

Beth Tikvah, which literally means house of hope, is a Jewish group home for adults with developmental disabilities. The name is appropriate for the six residents who have come here from other centres, many of which, they indicate, were not as caring as the place they now call home.

Located in West Hamilton, Beth Tikvah was founded after years of advocacy by a board of directors that believed facilities for developmentally disabled adults in the Hamilton area were not providing Jewish residents with an environment where their culture was respected or supported.

As stated in Beth Tikvah Foundation's mission statement, the group envisioned a home "where each person is entitled to live in a stable nurturing, age-appropriate, culturally sensitive environment... steeped in tradition and the observance of all Judaic laws and customs."

The vision is now a reality, but success has exacted a price. Some government officials feel that the clients don't really belong in a group home.

"Our people are seen as high functioning," explains Lea Odoardi-Pollard, executive director of the residence. "But one reason Beth Tikvah clients do so well is because they're very well supported and they have structure."

If the same officials had been around six years ago, she says, they would have observed that there has been a dramatic change in some of the residents.

"Everything here is done to optimize people's abilities. In the right environment, people blossom."

A close bond, built and nurtured in the last four years, exists between Beth Tikvah counsellors and residents. During weekly planning sessions, staff help clients plan their day, budget their finances and cope with any emotional issue that may arise.

Integration in the community is considered important and residents are known in their neighborhood, and at recreational facilities and government-funded workshops across the city.

When they go to the local dry cleaner, flower shop, kosher deli or butcher, the residents are greeted by neighbors and merchants.

"We know there are other people in the Jewish community who need us but want to remain in their own environment or with their families," says Odoardi-Pollard.

Although Beth Tikvah can't take any more residents, people in the community can be supported through home visits or through participating in the home's Shabbat dinners or other activities.

Accountant new president of Winnipeg JCC

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Larry Hurtig, an accountant and businessman, has recently been elected president of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJCC).

A major challenge says Hurtig, who for the past three years has been vice-president in charge of budget and allocations, will be to keep young Jewish adults in the city and to attract immigrants to Winnipeg in order to counteract the city's aging population. "We have one of the highest percentages of Jewish seniors in Canada," he says. "We have to do more to keep young people here."

Hurtig has been involved in Winnipeg's efforts to attract Jewish families from Argentina. Since the initiative was started last year, six Argentinian Jewish families have moved to the city.

The new president notes the importance of smoothly integrating the WJCC's beneficiary agencies — including the new Western Canada Jewish Museum and Holocaust Centre — into the Asper Jewish Community Campus when it opens next fall.

Gene therapy employed in cancer treatment

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Cancer researchers are excited for the first time in many years.

"The most exciting things are happening in cancer research and gene therapy," says Dr. Michael Baker, physician-in-chief at the Toronto Hospital, associate chair of medicine at the University of Toronto and clinical oncologist at Princess Margaret Hospital.

Baker, a founding board member of the Leukemia Research Fund, Interlink and the Canadian Foundation for AIDS Research also served as host to Princess Margaret at the opening of the new Princess Margaret Hospital last year.

"We can now take a blood sample, look at the genes of a patient and determine if the patient would be susceptible to breast or prostate cancer," he says. "Some patients have a hereditary factor and the genes indicate that they have a high risk of getting cancer."

The first part of their research involved examining and locating an abnormal gene in women with breast cancer who have relatives with a strong history of the disease, Baker explained.

"Now we know what the mutation looks like," he says. "It must be responsible for the growing and spreading." He notes that there are similar findings in prostate cancer, but the research is not as advanced.

"Today, we know how to change and alter genes and human gene therapy allows us to create new gene patterns."

Bone marrow transplants are "the best way to do gene therapy because the bone marrow cells reproduce and become part of the body." New genes stay in patients' bodies for the rest of their lives and fight cancer cells, he says.

"I believe this will make a big difference to future cancer patients and hopefully prevent cancer from occuring," Baker says.

Despite ongoing research, however, Baker says that the health delivery crisis is not only a local, but a worldwide problem.

"With a growing aging population who require more care, along with a rapid rise of expensive technology such as gene therapy and organ transplants, we keep inventing new treatments and don't have enough wealth to pay for them all."

He believes that Canada has to revise the Canada Health Act to permit private medicine to be established along with publicly funded health care. "Everyone should continue to have access to publicly funded medical health care but if you can afford it, you should, in addition, be able to access private health care services.

Referring to his day with Princess Margaret, Baker said she was a "wonderful visitor who was keenly interested in the programs at Princess Margaret Hospital and asked for details of patient care.

"I was impressed with her kindness in speaking to the patients and particularly in taking time to speak with the children of cancer patients in the children's area.

Study links protein with diabetes

NEW YORK – Leptin, the protein that made headlines two years ago when it was found to reduce obesity in mice, may be a cause of adult-onset diabetes in humans, according to a new Weizmann Institute of Science study.

The institute, based in Rehovot, Israel, found that high levels of leptin disrupt some of the activities of insulin, the hormone that controls blood sugar levels.

The research also suggests that if leptin is developed into a weight-loss drug in the future, it should be used with caution because it may cause the user to develop diabetes-related symptoms.

Weizman concludes 'milestone visit'

By BATSHEVA TSUR
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

BOMBAY — "This visit went beyond our expectations, both from the political and from the economic point of view," President Ezer Weizman said Saturday night, winding up a one-week state visit to India.

Weizman was speaking at a dinner hosted by the chief minister of the state of Maharashtra, Manohar Joshi. The president said he wanted to thank the government and the people of India for their warm hospitality and to send them blessings from the state of Israel.

"We have a great deal with which to help each other. I know how difficult it is to become independent after having been ruled by others. We went through it, too. You have built up your own universities and educated your own scientists, some of whom I met, and this is a great achievement," Weizman said.

He said that it was symbolic that when he first left India 50 years ago, he left from the port of Bombay, and that now it is known as Mumbai. India is currently in the process of renaming its towns by their original, Indian names.

Earlier Saturday night, the president inaugurated another joint Indo-Israeli venture: a 1,000-acre farm which will be cultivated jointly by experts and farmers from both countries.

"I would like to see more members of your community coming to Israel," Weizman told the local Jewish community members. "If possible, try to send your youth to us."

Passersby outside the Taj Mahal Hotel in Bombay were taken aback when the president decided to walk out and view the Bombay seafront, and the Gateway of India, a monument built to King George V when he arrived on Indian soil. Weizman shook hands with the crowd, who received him warmly.

Indian officials said that they were extremely pleased with the results of the visit, and that numerous economic deals had been worked out by members of the economic delegation.

Delegation members said that the presence of the president had given tremendous impetus to the deals.

"It was a milestone visit," said Dan Propper, head of the Manufacturers Association.

Hebron deal elusive

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — An Israeli-Palestinian agreement for the turnover of most of Hebron is still elusive.

After more than 13 weeks of intensive discussions, as well as a meeting between the leaders of the two sides, repeated statements that an agreement was imminent have proven premature.

Observers say the agreement is now being held up over a Palestinian demand that Israel adhere to a strict timetable for redeploying from rural sections of the West Bank, as called for under the terms of the Interim Agreement signed in September 1995.

As far as Hebron itself is concerned, the two sides have reportedly resolved most security issues relating to the Israeli troop redeployment in the West Bank town, which is home to some 500 Jewish settlers and 130,000 Palestinians.

Not yet resolved is the matter of joint Israeli-Palestinian patrols near the Tomb of the Patriarchs, which is holy to both Jews and Muslims.

But the Palestinians are now calling for commitments from Israel to implement aspects of the Interim Agreement that are not related to Hebron.

Along with the further redeployments in the West Bank, these include opening a safe passage route for Palestinians travelling between the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, and the release of Palestinian security prisoners from Israeli jails.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat met early Sunday morning at the Erez crossing separating Israel from the Gaza Strip, in an attempt to work out the remaining issues. But after more than four hours of discussions, they failed to resolve their differences.

The talks came after a week of indications that the two would soon hold a summit to initial an agreement. Instead, they apparently decided to hold a behind-the-scenes meeting in an effort to iron out the final obstacles.

Netanyahu later said he regretted that word of the meeting had been leaked to the media.

"I had hoped the meeting would remain secret, because I think it is important for such meetings to help build trust, to build working relationships," Netanyahu told a business conference. "There are some meetings which should not take place in the light of the cameras."

The WJRO, which was created in 1992 by the World Jewish Congress and the Jewish Agency for Israel, said the measures included calls for a withdrawal of investments in Swiss banks, cancellation of the banks' operating licences and a class action suit against the banks.

Jewish Agency chair Avraham Burg and World Jewish Congress secretary general Israel Singer said at the news conference that the WJRO had reluctantly formulated the list of punitive actions after Delamuraz made the comments last week.

Singer said the WJRO would wait four weeks before implementing the steps outlined in their proposal.

"This gives the Swiss enough time to consider their position," he said.

Noting that the Swiss government as a whole did not denounce Delamuraz' statement — though a few legislators did register their displeasure — Singer said there has apparently been a "sea change" in the government's desire to resolve the issue of Jewish assets.

In light of this change, Burg said, it is "incumbent upon us to establish a strong policy."

In addition to its proposal for a boycott of Swiss banks by Jewish business leaders and organizations, the WJRO may file a class action suit against the Swiss Bankers Association on behalf of hundreds of thousands of Holocaust survivors and their heirs.

Other proposals include a call for private organizations, as well as federal, state and local authorities in the United States and elsewhere to withdraw their investments from Swiss banks.

If the Swiss government does not act quickly, the WJRO may also ask U.S. legislators to scrutinize the licensing of Swiss banks.

Acknowledging that the measures, if implemented, could have wide-ranging repercussions, Singer said, "We do not take this matter lightly. But we cannot take the words of a person who speaks for a nation lightly either."

Delamuraz' comments must be "rejected by Switzerland and the bankers clearly and very, very decisively," Singer added.

Switzerland has been at the centre of an international furor over its wartime dealings with Nazi Germany and the fate of Jewish assets deposited during the Holocaust.

Jewish groups have suggested that Switzerland set up a preliminary fund as "a good faith financial gesture."

Jewish and Swiss officials have been discussing the creation of such a fund in recent weeks, and negotiations have centred around the $250 million figure.

Israel, Hezbollah clash in Lebanon

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — For the third successive day, Israel and Hezbollah engaged in heavy exchanges of fire last Sunday in southern Lebanon.

Israeli jets fired at suspected bases of the Islamic fundamentalist movement in Lebanon and returned safely to base.

In separate fighting, three Israeli soldiers were reported to be very lightly hurt in clashes.

The weekend was marked by Hezbollah attacks on Israeli outposts in southern Lebanon and by retaliatory raids launched by Israeli fighter jets.

Australian Jewish schools excel

By JEREMY JONES
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

SYDNEY, Australia — Jewish day schools in Victoria have taken the top five positions in the first-ever official listing of academic achievement in the Australian state.

In a study prepared for the government by Melbourne University that was based on results in high school final examinations in 1996, Bialik College topped the list.

It was followed by Mount Scopus Memorial College, Liebler-Yavneh College, Beth Rivkah Ladies College and Yeshiva College.

"The day schools' performance has established that the time devoted to Jewish education has not detracted from the quality of secular education at our schools," Diane Shteinman, president of the Executive Council of Australian Jewry, said in an interview.

"Australian Jews appreciate that the focus of the day schools has been to encourage their pupils' development as members of the Jewish and broader Australian communities, which they have achieved admirably," she said.

Rabbi Mordechai Gutnick, education chair of the Jewish Community Council of Victoria, attributed the results to "the importance of study" that "Judaism has always stressed."

Although their schools won the two top positions in the rankings, senior educators at Bialik and Mount Scopus colleges have criticized the publication of the Achievement Index, arguing that it "sends the wrong message" regarding education.

Since the destruction of the Temple, the priesthood — handed down from father to son — has bound its members by certain obligations, such as keeping ritually pure at a distance from the dead and not marrying a divorcee.

Skorecki, along with Sara Selig and Shraga Blazer at the Technion and Robert and Neil Bradman, P.J. Waburton, Monica Ismajlowicz and Michael Hammer of London's University College and the University of Arizona, found a preponderance of the YAP, DYS19B haplotype in kohanim of both Ashkenazi and Sephardi origin (as well as a few Yemenites), but not in the non-kohanim. This served as further evidence that the Jewish priesthood predated the division of world Jewry into the two major ethnic groups over 1,000 years ago.

Any differences in the gene structure would reflect molecular-biological changes due to mutations; these are useful in calibrating the rate of mutations in the genes and observing human molecular evolution, he added.

The Y chromosome, carried only by men, is passed patrilineally; mitichondrial DNA is transmitted by the mother's X chromosomes.

"The Y chromosome is not very important; half of the world's population manages fine without it. But it can provide some anthropological information," Skorecki said.

He added that it was impressive that the characteristic Y chromosome was passed down to today's kohanim despite periods of assimilation over the millenia. Even secular Jews seem to know if they are of the priestly tribe, says the professor. But he added that if the trends of secularism, assimilation and intermarriage continue in the Diaspora, the number of Jews with this priestly haplotype will probably decline.

The Week in Israel

Dec. 30

• Officials expressed concern about the possibility of coordinated attacks by Palestinian terrorists and Kurdish rebels against Israeli targets in Turkey after recent reports that members of the Kurdish underground have met with members of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine.

Dec. 31

• A resident of Kfar Darom in the Gaza Strip fatally shot a Palestinian who had apparently entered the village without permission. Residents thought the Palestinian was planning an abduction.

• A 52-year-old woman, Tova Gamliel had triplets. She is the oldest woman in Israel to have ever given birth to triplets.

Jan. 1

• Noam Friedman, 22, of Ma'aleh Adumim, opened fire in a Hebron market wounding seven Palestinians. He was prevented from injuring more Palestinians by fellow soldier Avi Buskela who overpowered him. Friedman later explained that he was attempting to derail the Hebron negotiations.

Jan. 2

• Israel agreed to establish a model farm in India. The announcement stemmed from an agreement signed by the two countries during the visit last week by President Ezer Weizman to India.

Jan. 3

• Yediot Ahronot reported seven cabinet ministers were opposed to the proposed redeployment from Hebron. Rafael Eitan and Yuli Edelshtein have even threatened to vote against the agreement in the Knesset. Edelshtein has also threatened to resign from the coalition.

• Yediot Ahronot reported Rabbi Eliezer Waldman, head of Mir yeshivah in Kiryat Arba, had been questioned by police in connection with statements he made regarding the refusal by soldiers to obey orders. The rabbi denied he was being criminally investigated. He said he met with police to clarify the remarks in question.

Arafat, Netanyahu face similar domestic constraints

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

As 1997 unfolds, one wonders whether it will be as turbulent for Israel as 1996.

Mideast Analysis

In February and March, Israel was convulsed by four suicide bombings which rattled its facade of security and shook the peace process.

In April, Israel launched its biggest military operation in Lebanon — Grapes of Wrath — since 1982.

In May, the Likud defeated the Labor party in general elections, paving the way for the premiership of Benjamin Netanyahu and a set of new policies.

In August, Syrian troop movements in Lebanon sparked nervous speculation that Damascus was on a war footing.

In September, the opening of an archeological tunnel in Jerusalem triggered a wave of unprecedented Arab-Israeli violence in the territories.

So what comes next? What can we reasonably look for this year?

The manner in which events transpire will largely depend on the peace process, which, surveys indicate, is supported by the vast majority of Israelis .

If it moves forward steadily, as it did under the previous government, Israel will be well positioned to improve its deteriorating relations with the Palestinians and with the Arab world.

If it falters in a welter of mutual recriminations, the political temperature will rise and the prospect of additional acrimony between Israel and the Arabs will increase.

At the moment, Israel and the Palestine Authority, led by Yasser Arafat, appear to be on a collision course.

Netanyahu, due to his personal convictions and the composition of his cabinet, seems reluctant to offer the Palestinians more than limited self-autonomy.

Arafat, however, demands a full-fledged Palestinian state in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, with East Jerusalem as its capital.

It is manifestly difficult to envisage how these conflicting visions can be harmonized, particularly in light of the pressures that have been brought to bear on both leaders by their respective constituents.

Netanyahu's political survival is dependent upon the backing of small parties — religious and secular — which regard the West Bank as historic and inviolate Jewish territory and, from a security point of view, as absolutely vital to Israel's existence. If he breaks faith with either of these strictures, his government could fall. In that case, Netanyahu may surprise everyone and form a national unity government with the Labor party. If it comes to that, Netanyahu will be branded as a traitor or applauded as a pragmatist.

Arafat's domestic problems are remarkably similar. His Palestinian supporters in the territories will be satisfied with nothing less than a sovereign state, for which there is no provision in the Oslo accords. If he settles for anything less, he will probably face a rebellion, a scenario which is scarcely in Israel's interest.

Israel's Arab partners — Egypt and Jordan — also have expectations: an Israeli withdrawal, more or less, to the pre-1967 lines and the establishment of an independent Palestinian state between Israel and the Jordan River.

The Palestinians will place these demands on the table at final status talks, which are scheduled to begin following Israel's deployment from the Arab sector of Hebron. If their claims are rejected, Israel's relationship with Egypt and Jordan, which has plummeted in recent months, will doubtless degenerate.

In the meantime, the focus will be on Israeli settlements in the West Bank and on the spectre of Palestinian terrorism.

If Israel continues with its expansion program, as Netanyahu has promised, Palestinian and Arab bitterness will grow.

And if there is an upsurge of terrorism, it will turn more Israelis away from the peace process, a factor Arafat can ignore only at his peril.

Israel's ties with Syria, which have reached rockbottom since Netanyahu's accession to power six months ago, may worsen should bilateral negotiations on the Golan Heights remain suspended.

The Syrians have not deviated from their position for a full Israeli pullback from the Golan. And while Netanyahu has offered to resume the talks without preconditions, he rejects the land-for-peace formula and believes that the Golan must be retained by Israel. However, Foreign Minister David Levy has let it be known that, without territorial concessions, there is no chance for a peace treaty with Syria.

If the Syrian track remains frozen, Syria may initiate limited hostilities in a bid to break the diplomatic logjam. This could take the form of an attack against Israeli fortifications on Mt. Hermon, or of support for cross-border terrorism (which Syria has strictly forbidden for more than two decades now).

In the absence of a settlement, the Syrians will go on using Hezbollah and rejectionist Palestinian groups as deadly surrogates in southern Lebanon, Israel's last remaining war front and a killing field that claimed the lives of 27 Israeli troops in 1996.

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Department of Justice recently announced the start of denaturalization proceedings against two men alleged to have participated in the wartime persecution of Jews.

It also announced that 16 Japanese citizens, involved in gruesome wartime experiments or in the operation of "comfort women stations," were placed on the U.S. government's "watchlist" of aliens who are not eligible to enter the country.

In documents filed in court, the Office of Special Investigations (OSI) alleged that Michael Kolnhofer, 79, was a member of the German Waffen-SS in September 1942 and joined the SS Death's Head Guard Battalion at the Sachsenhausen concentration camp near Berlin in January 1943, where he served as a guard of prisoners until January 1944. Tens of thousands of prisoners, including Jews and Allied soldiers, were murdered. From Sachsenhausen, Kolnhofer was transferred to Buchenwald.

In a second case, the OSI alleged that Adolph Milius, also known as Adolfas Milinavicius, 78, a retired physician, was a member of the Lithuanian Security Police (the Saugumas) for Vilnius province during the summer and fall of 1941. It is alleged he participated in Nazi-sponsored acts of persecution as a member of Saugumas, which closely paralleled the German Gestapo. The Saugumas collaborated with German forces in arresting and turning over, for execution or punishment, Jews who violated Nazis' decrees, Jews caught attempting to escape ghettos and those who attempted to hide Jews. Wartime records found in Lithuanian Central State Archives show Milius participated in the arrests of Jews attempting to escape from the ghetto.

The inclusion on the U.S. "watchlist" of Japanese citizens is a first for the United States and was authorized under the Holtzman Amendment, which bars anyone who participated with German forces or their allies in the persecution of civilians.

Some of the men barred from the United States took part in inhumane and frequently lethal medical experiments on non-volunteer prisoners in Manchuria. Others were involved in running "comfort stations" in which women from Asian nations were held captive, beaten, tortured and raped day after day by Japanese officers and soldiers.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our third annual Purim Art Contest. We are asking students in elementary schools to submit drawings about Purim.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on March 20. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small. Please paint, draw or color bright, bold, colorful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. And you can even give them a title.
Please send us your name, address, phone number, school and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Rd., Suite 205, North York, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, March 3, 1997.

We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen for publication as "winners". The judges will base their decision on a number of factors such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges'decisions will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 7, 1997.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 20, 1997. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Croatia strives to revamp relations with Jews

This is the first of a two-part series on Croatia's Jewish community. The first part deals with the shifting relationship between the Tudjman government and the country's Jews. The second part focuses on the challenges confronting the Jewish community as it strives to survive.

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ZAGREB, Croatia — On the first night of Chanukah, Ognjen Kraus, the president of Croatia's 2,000-member Jewish community, took the stage of Zagreb's modern Lisinski concert hall and lit the candles on a 3-foot-tall menorah. With television cameras trained on him, Kraus recited the Chanukah blessings in Hebrew before an audience that included President Franjo Tudjman and other dignitaries.

A narrator told the story of Chanukah and the candles then burned brightly throughout a concert of Prokofiev, Bruch and Mendelssohn.

The high-profile candlelighting was part of celebrations marking the 190th anniversary of Zagreb's Jewish community.

The attendance of Tudjman and other senior officials was part of continuing efforts by the Croatian government to demonstrate support for Jewish causes and to combat its negative image.

"Taking everything into account, it was positive that Tudjman attended," said one Zagreb Jew. "The concert reminded Zagreb and Croatia of history – what happened in history – and showed that we are still here. But on the whole, maybe it was more important for Tudjman to be there, than for us."

Tudjman's government has been accused of trying to whitewash Croatia's fascist past through various initiatives aimed at rehabilitating the homegrown fascist Ustashe regime that ruled Croatia as a Nazi puppet state during World War II.

These moves have drawn sharp protests from Jews as well as former anti-fascist partisans and others inside Croatia.

They have also drawn international criticism and blocked Israel from establishing diplomatic relations.

Tudjman drew particular fire earlier this year by declaring that he wanted to rebury the bones of Croatian fascists at a Yugoslav-built memorial to scores of thousands of Jews and Serbs slaughtered at the Ustashe's Jasenovac concentration camp.

"They don't want to admit that the [wartime] Independent Croatian State was a racist state,"said Vlasta Kovac, editor of the Zagreb Jewish community's Bulletin. "They would prefer if this was forgotten."

Some 25,000 Jews lived in Croatia before World War II. About 20,000 were killed by the Nazis or the local Ustashe regime.

Of the 2,000 members of Croatia's Jewish community today, some 1,400 live in Zagreb, the capital.

A well-publicized letter from Croatian Jewish leaders a year ago said, "There is no open anti-Semitism in Croatia, either in everyday life or in any political party program, or in the attitude of government representatives toward Jews."

The letter expressed the view that "the Republic of Croatia is paying attention to the standpoints of our community and there is a mutual dialogue."

Jewish leaders meet with Tudjman and other senior officials, and several Jews have prominent government positions. "The Jewish community is small but functioning," Slobodan Lang, an adviser to Tudjman, said in an interview. Lang, whose father was Jewish, maintains ties with the community.

Besides the attempts at historical revisionism, recent negative trends include the bitter complaints over Croatia's property restitution policy and Tudjman's continuing attacks against his critics. Shortly after the Chanukah concert, he blasted people who complain about human rights and lack of media freedom in Croatia as enemies seeking to subvert the Croatian state.

He named prominent critics, including Slavko Goldstein, a former president of the Jewish community.

More positive trends include the government's funding of the reconstruction of the Zagreb Jewish community building after it was hit by a terrorist bomb in 1991, its cooperative relationships with aid organizations such as the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee and the honors it has paid to Jews and Jewish causes.

On another positive note, Tudjman toned down statements in a book that were viewed as anti-Semitic and apologized for giving offense.

But some Jewish community members and observers voice concern over what they see as an uncomfortable aspect: an official attitude that seems to use its support for Jews as a means of demonstrating human rights principles and counterbalancing the negative image of nationalism and historical revisionism.

"The Jewish community in Croatia and in other former Yugoslav republics is not endangered by anti-Semitism," Zagreb historian Ivo Goldstein wrote in a report prepared in the spring for the American Jewish Committee. "Its bigger enemy is low standard of living, insincere philo-Semitism and the constant threat that the local Jewish population can be manipulated and used in propaganda goals."

Before and during the recent wars in Yugoslavia, officials in both Croatia and Serbia attempted to win Western support by showing favor to Jews and Israel. This attitude is still apparent.

"Every side in the Yugoslav war was trying to use the Jews, to make friends with the Jews," Ivo Goldstein said in an interview.

Said a member of the Zagreb Jewish community: "They think that we are important because we have connections with the Jewish world, with the World Jewish Congress, with Israel. This is what gives us some weight."

Syria slams Israel's Lebanon proposals

By ELDAD BECK
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

PARIS — Israel has recently relayed to Lebanon, through French diplomatic channels, a proposal to replace the IDF and SLA presence in the security zone with an interim force from France, Egypt and Jordan, Lebanese sources said last week.

However, according to the sources, Syria intends to veto the Israeli proposal, considered by Damascus as another attempt to separate the Lebanese and Syrian peace tracks.

Syria sees the Israeli proposal as a new version of the "Lebanon first" idea, broached by Netanyahu's government a few weeks after its election and then rejected by Damascus.

Moreover, Syria is not interested in having other Arab military forces stationed in Lebanon, especially not from Jordan. Tensions between Syria and the Hashemite kingdom have been growing over recent months.

The new Israeli proposal was to be discussed last Saturday in a meeting held in Paris between French President Jacques Chirac and Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. After the meeting, held at the Elysee Palace, Hariri was asked by journalists to confirm reports about secret contacts between Israel and France over the future of south Lebanon.

Hariri said that during the meeting Chirac told him that these reports were baseless.

The French Ministry of Foreign Affairs officially denied the reports, stressing at the same time France's willingness to help in future agreements between Israel and Lebanon.

When asked whether Lebanon would accept the presence of French forces in the security zone, Hariri answered: "There is no question of that."

According to Elysee spokesperson, Catherine Colona, Chirac and Hariri emphasized during their discussion the persistence of uncertainties over the future of the Middle East peace process and expressed their concern over the repeated delays in the talks. Both Chirac and Hariri said they were content with the "satisfactory functioning and useful role" of the five-party committee monitoring the understandings reached between Israel and Hezbollah in south Lebanon.

Singles Registry Celebrates Sensational Year With Another Engagement

The year 1996 was a record breaking year for new memberships at the Jewish Singles Registry of Toronto, and 1997 looks even better. In a little over 4 years the J.S.R. concept of letting members choose for themselves who they would like to meet by viewing biography/profiles and photographs has swept Toronto singles with a passion. New members are joining on a daily basis, a good portion of which are referrals from friends who are already part of the J.S.R. Most new members are dating within a week or so of joining the service. IT IS THAT EASY! Membership is now well over 1,200 members.

Another Engagement

What better way to start 1997, than to announce that another J.S.R. couple will be walking down the aisle in just a short little while. It has also been reported that two other J.S.R. couples will be formally announcing their engagements shortly. With dozens of serious relationships on the go, there is no better time than now, to register with the Jewish Singles Registry.

You're the Boss

By MARLENE EISNER
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — A story written in the Grade 4 Jewish heritage class at Royal Vale School last year has been named as one of the winners of Get Writing!, a national writing contest for Canada's English and French elementary school children.

The Canadian Children's Book Centre in Toronto announced the winners from among 10,000 English-language and 2,000 French-language entries. Ten-year old Michelle Roseman of Cote St. Luc won for her story, The Mysterious Musician of Ooga.

The story is about the town of Ooga, a Hebrew word which means cake. Everyone in the town makes cakes and is happy doing so. One day, though, the people of Ooga begin to fight about who makes the best cakes. Bitter arguments divide the town and the baking stops.

When a mysterious stranger called Shalom comes to town with his music, the townsfolk remember the joy of working to bake cakes.

How did Michelle get her idea?

"At the beginning of the year, we learned Hebrew food words and I really liked the word ooga, which means cake," says Michelle.

"I thought, how can I use this word in my story? Then, it just came. It had a good meaning, which is not who makes a better cake, but that every one enjoys making the cake, the spirit of working together and cooperation."

Michelle entered the contest in a round-about way. Her teacher Annetta Black liked the story so much, she asked Michelle to read it in front of the class, but Michelle was too shy. Instead, Michelle joked that when and if her story ever won a contest, she would read it aloud.

"Annetta suggested I enter it in a contest, but I wasn't that enthusiastic because I thought it would never win. It was mom who did most of the work entering it," says Michelle.

For Michelle's mother, Marlene Roseman, winning the award was a pleasant surprise, but her daughter's writing ability is not.

"She is now writing a novel called the Gnelves of Troll's Field and has just completed chapter 13."

As part of her prize, Michelle travelled to Toronto for a weekend. She met authors, attended book-writing workshops, saw a Raptor's game and went on a Chapter's book store shopping spree.

"I want to be an animator or a journalist when I grow up," says Michelle. "I've always wanted to be a writer and since I've been little, I've been reading and writing stories."

Book honors both famous and ordinary women

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

When we read about famous Jewish people, we usually read about Jewish men, like Abraham or Moses or David Ben-Gurion. But what about all the important Jewish women over the ages?

Now we can learn about the contributions Jewish women have made, not only to their own people, but to the world at large, in a fascinating book Remarkable Jewish Women; Rebels, Rabbis, and Other Women from Biblical Times to the Present, by Emily Taitz and Sondra Henry (Jewish Publication Society, 1996).

Many of the women are well-known. We have all heard of the prophet Deborah, Rachel and Miriam in the Bible; Golda Meir, the first prime minister of Israel; and Emma Lazarus, whose poem The Grand Colossus, which ends "Give me your tired, your poor,/Your huddled masses yearning to breathe free," is inscribed on the Statue of Liberty.

But did you know about the Maid of Ludomir, who taught Talmud in a small town in Poland, or Henrietta Szold, who founded Hadassah or Sally Priesand, who was the first woman ordained to be a rabbi.

There are women who ran some of the first printing presses, women who were very involved in charity work, education or politics, and authors. Taitz and Henry even talk about women astronauts and war heroes.

What impressed me, is that they don't only consider famous women important. They realize that women who cared for their families and did the best they could in difficult times are also worthy of being known. Gluckel of Hameln, born in 1646 in Germany, was widowed early, and not only brought up her children, as was expected, but ran the family business. Her diaries tell us a lot about the lives of women, and of Jews in those times.

All the descriptions have pictures with them, and there is a very helpful alphabetical index, so you can look for anyone you particularly want to find out about. It is also helpful that Remarkable Jewish Women is organized by subject, so you can look up people under Holocaust, or pious women or the new world.

Alternative theatre struggles with Jewish issues

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

The alternative theatre scene is struggling with Jewish issues, particularly in their portrayal of events dealing with the Palestinians.

Opinion

Actors, directors and producers are drawn instinctively to the underdog and it is not surprising that theatre people should identify with the Palestinians. Their artistic nature impels them to see injustice when a minority faces what they think may be arbitrary measures imposed by those with power.

So they appear hell-bent on giving the Palestinians as much favorable time on the stage as their media brothers and sisters give them in print, on TV and on radio.

Perhaps it is time for them to look honestly at the rights and wrongs of the situation that has triggered violence on the streets and appears to have turned a lot of world opinion against Jews.

And why are some alternative theatre groups so hostile to Israel's case? Reading Hebron by Jewish playwright Jason Sherman at the Factory Theatre explores the thesis that it was radical Zionist zealots who were responsible for that massacre and that it was condoned by Israel's government.

Sherman is a flash-point for the anti-Israel antics of his theatre cohorts. After all, he is Jewish, and if he thinks Israel may be in the wrong, then let's fire away.

The fact that he has won major playwriting awards increases his status among his peers. This reviewer complained that in Retreat, one of the award winners, Sherman was getting easy laughs at the expense of Jewish stereotypes. In League of Nations, Sherman introduces the character of Canadian Nathan Abramowitz who is not happy with what he finds in Israel in the '80s.

In his new version of Reading Hebron, in which Abramowitz reappears, Sherman has raised the stakes. If anyone doubts the anti-Israel intent of the new Reading Hebron, a puff piece by its director, Brian Quirt, distributed by the Theatre to the media in advance of the play's opening, makes it clear.

Fires in the Mirror about the Crown Heights riots is by WUM, a Toronto black theatre company whose good intentions I do not question. The play pits the articulate and sophisticated arguments of black activists against the mundane, unsophisticated reactions of Lubavitcher housewives.

It is true that the fear of progroms is well expressed and the Jewish side of the Crown Heights battle is not overlooked. But the anti-Jewish argument that the deaths endured by blacks under slavery are a bigger Holocaust than what happened to the Jews under Hitler helps fuel the engine of black anti-Semitism. It is asking too much of a black theatre company to go straight down the middle on this issue.

Kvetch, by a British playwright, featuring many vulgar stereotypes attributed to Jews, is an example of the kind of production enhusiastically produced in Toronto.

Have they given serious thought to the results of lighting or feeding the flames of overt and latent anti-Semitism?

This is not to tar the whole alternative theatre scene with the same brush. At Tarragon Extra Space, the plight of a Jewish maverick facing ouster from a hotel (The Slow Eviction of Ruby Rosenholtz) is realistically and dramatically probed. One couldn't ask for a greater slice of realism and artistic brilliance, despite its production shortcomings. There have been many honest portrayals of the ups and downs in the modern Jewish scene in small theatres, some of them quite memorable.

But this viewer of alternative theatre in Toronto since its beginnings in the '60s has come reluctantly to the conclusion that it has moved too far into the anti-Israel corner.

Israel aims to cut deficit in '97 budget

By EVELYN GORDON
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – The 1997 budget passed without changes last week by a straight party line vote of 60-42.

Passage of the NIS 190 billion budget completes the bulk of the government's efforts to pass a NIS 7.2 billion deficit-reduction package.

The treasury is still NIS 270 million short of its goal. It is unclear how this sum will be made up, after the Knesset's refusal to cancel a half tax-credit for married, working women.

The budget is meant to produce a deficit of no more than 2.8 percent of Gross Domestic Product (GDP). That is significantly lower than the 1996 deficit, which is expected to be more than 3.5 percent of GDP.

In contrast to the Economic Arrangements Law which accompanied the budget, there was no real controversy in the coalition over the budget itself.

Coalition partners receive compensation

According to Finance Minister Dan Meridor, however, the coalition partners did receive compensation that will cost between NIS 550 million and NIS 600 million. Most of that will come out of budgetary reserves. The breakdown on the deals is as follows:

• The Third Way, NIS 65 million. This money will be used to develop existing settlements in the Golan Heights and the Jordan Valley.

• Yisrael Ba'aliya, NIS 72 million. This includes an additional

Funeral Fun

Off-Beat Off-Broadway

• Now entering its third year in an off-Broadway theatre is Grandma Sylvia's Funeral, a peculiar show that seems to have won some excellent reviews from the international Jewish press. Billed as "the longest-running funeral in history," it is a "hilarious, moving, and totally outrageous interactive comedy" that puts the audience in the midst of the action during a Jewish funeral.

Audience members arriving at the Helsenrot Jewish Mortuary (actually the Soho Playhouse) are greeted as if they were dear friends of the deceased, who was supposedly hit by a garbage truck on a Brooklyn street in her 83rd year. The 21 actors who portray Sylvia's relatives and friends involve the audience in the machinations and general craziness of the family. A bagel buffet is presented midway through the performance. 15 Vandam St. (between Spring & Prince). 212- 691-1555.

Music

• Two Lost Souls is the name of a new CD recently released by Racheal Rosen of Toronto and Brett McCaig of St. Thomas, Ont. As one might expect from this youthful duo, who have a surprising amount of stage experience to their respective credit, the CD is a "Broadway sampler" with tunes from nearly a dozen different shows. The predominant style is jazz. Two Lost Souls is available at the Poor Alex Theatre and the HMV Superstore.

• The Bloor JCC is starting an Adult Co-Ed Choir, with an expected eclectic repertoire of doo-wap, jazz, classical, folk, r&b, ethnic, chant, Jewish and Yiddish songs. Rehearsals, directed by Harriet Wichin, to take the form of two-hour weekly sessions (7:30 - 9:30 p.m.) over 12 weeks, starting Jan. 20 or Jan. 23, depending on availability. Sightreading is not mandatory. If you can sing and can learn by ear or by cassette, you are invited to join. JCC members $65, non-members $80. 416- 924-6211.

For Children

• Canada-Israel Association for Child Protetction E.L.I. has reserved a preferred block of tickets for Sesame Street Live's production of Let's Be Friends, Hummingbird Centre (formerly the O'Keefe Centre), 4:30 p.m., March 23, 1997. Tickets $50. Half of the purchase price goes to aid abused children in Israel. Post-show reception features fun, friends, treats and loot bags. For more details, call 416-488-4424 or call 416-872-2262 to order tickets. Please refer to "Child Protection" when ordering. Charitable receipt provided.

NIS 60 million in the budget for building hostels for elderly immigrants, and NIS 12 million in research funds for immigrant scientists.

• Religious parties (Shas, National Religious Party and United Torah Judaism), about NIS 450 million. The sum reported by Meridor to the Knesset was NIS 360 million, but there's also an unspecified amount that is intended to reverse the erosion in stipends for yeshiva students over the last four years. That's expected to come to between NIS 80 million and NIS 100 million. The NIS 360 million will go primarily to build new classrooms and rental housing, as well as funding various activities overseen by the Religious Affairs Ministry, such as the construction and maintenance of cemeteries, synagogues and mikvot, budgets for the religious councils, etc.

It cost the government NIS 1.4 billion to satisfy Gesher and Likud MKs by cancelling several major elements in the Economic Arrangements Law, such as cuts in child allowances, payments for visits to the doctor and a hike in co-payments for medicines. This sum is largely to be made up by tax increases.

Photographer receives $10,000 grant

TORONTO – Ruth Caplan, a Toronto photographer, has been awarded a grant of $10,000 by the Toronto Arts Council.

She is one of 32 Toronto artists who have been granted a total of $230,786 in the council's 1996 list of winners. The jury reviewed 256 applications, a record increase in a program that usually receives between 180 and 200 applications.

Others to receive grants were Eli Langer, $7,877, for drawing/painting; Rae Davis/Barbara Sternberg, $8,000 for sculpture/installation; Micah Lexier, $10,000 and Shonagh Adelman, $6,000, for mixed media and printmaking.

Al Waxman prepares to direct Lost in Yonkers

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO – Veteran actor-director Al Waxman is preparing to direct Neil Simon's Pulitzer prize-winning play Lost In Yonkers here, with a slated eight-week run beginning Feb. 4 at the 450-seat Atlantis Theatre at Ontario Place.

The play will be the third Waxman has directed in the Toronto area in as many years. Like the two previous productions, Sight Unseen and A Shayna Maidel, which received favorable reviews when they ran at the Ford Centre in North York, Lost In Yonkers focuses on a Jewish family. But Waxman asserts he chooses plays that happen to be very good, not necessarily because they have Jewish content.

"They're really universal in their stories and their appeal and their entertainment value," he says. "Lost In Yonkers involves a Jewish family but it resonates way beyond that. It resonates with meaningful moments for any person who is part of a family."

Simon's 25th Broadway play won the Pulitzer prize for drama in 1992. Set in the New York area in 1942, it's about two teenaged brothers who go live with their grandmother in Yonkers after their mother dies and their father's work takes him away for a year.

The grandmother, a German-Jewish refugee who has fled pre-war Nazi persecution, rules the roost with an iron fist, intimidating her grandsons and their various misfit uncles and aunts.

"It's a very emotional story that has to do with the absence of love and warmth in the bringing up of children, contrasting this with a home that has all these things," Waxman says. "Like most of Neil Simon's work, it's just filled with humor."

Casting has just been completed, with veteran stage actor Jennifer Phipps playing the grandmother and the parts of the two boys going to Noah Plener and Benjamin Plener, 16 and 14-year-old brothers and nephews of actor Harvey Atkin.

"They're wonderful actors and exactly the right age. I'm thrilled to Arthur Miller's Death Of A Salesman at the Stratford Festival, and he says he is very much looking forward to the role. "I've just finished two movies, I'm directing a play, and then I'm going into Stratford to act, so it's a rather enjoyable time for me. It's a joy to work with good people, and I'm also having the pleasure of working on and studying two very important plays.

"I've always thought of Williams, O'Neill and Miller as the truly great American playwrights; there's a few more, like Albee and Inge. I'd also include Neil Simon up there."

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — For some, retirement is a time to slow down. But Renee and Victor Topper have turned their retirement into a thriving business.

Five years ago, Victor closed his fur processing business and started looking for things to do. The Toppers began importing chocolates and gourmet products but found they had little time left for their favorite hobby – collecting art. So they decided to sell their food distribution business and turn their hobby into a business.

Victor began collecting as a child, beginning with comic books, bubble gum cards and sports memorabilia. Over the years, the Toppers collected and specialized in Japanese prints, and lacquer work, netsuke (small specialized carvings), snuff bottles, scroll paintings, bronze vessels and antiquities.

Two years ago, they opened Topper Gallery in Markham, Ont. Their hobby-turned business often takes them to far away places to buy and sell and they participate in international conventions and shows. At first, they bought and sold a variety of items, including North American Indian prints, Inuit carvings and Judaica, but now they focus on Oriental art.

The Toppers have sold pieces to the Royal Ontario Museum and other museums around the world. "We get calls from collectors and museums but we also have objects for novice collectors and we love to get people interested in collecting," says Renee.

She explains it is important to know the origin of a piece and to be able to trace the object to be certain of its value and its authenticity. A buyer would do well to go to museums and learn about the object he wants to collect, she stresses.

The Toppers have four children and nine grandchildren, and like to include them in their business. Renee's parents, Vicki and Sam Rosenberg, can always be counted on to help out at a show or exhibition, Renee says.

Boys of Bayview early favorites in hockey league

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Who's going to stop the boys from Bayview?

Last year, they skated through the opposition like a sharp knife through tender brisket and this year could be more of the same.

Nevertheless, enthusiasm is high on all four teams as the Jewish day school hockey league enters its second season.

United Synagogue Day School, Bayview branch, was the class of the league last season and could well repeat as champions this time around. Teams from USDS Bathurst, USDS Richmond Hill and Bialik stand in the way of a Bayview repeat.

Robert Samery, one of the organizers of the day school league and father of Jordan, who plays for USDS Bathurst, said the success of last year's inaugural season has prompted another go-round for the league.

Each team will play eight games through the winter with a season highlight, the second annual Yitzhak Rabin Memorial Tournament, scheduled for February. A team from Hamilton could round out the competition in that hotly anticipated event.

In addition to the regular season and tournament games, the four teams will also play exhibition games against a number of non-Jewish schools, such as Allenby Public School and Brown Public School, Samery said.

Next year, the league hopes to expand to include other Jewish day schools. But in the meantime, the boys have laced up their Tacks and Bauers and have had lots of fun playing each other while supplementing their weekly phys.-ed activities.

"We found last season to be a great success in pulling together the kids from various Jewish day schools who wouldn't otherwise socialize together," Samery said.

The teams consist of players in Grades 4 to 6 and while last season a few girls participated, this year it's an all-boys league.

Ontario ski school is thriving

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

He has turned his life-long passion for skiing into a thriving business — Snowhawks Ski School — with ski and snowboarding programs for children and teens from six to 18, and for adults 19 to 99.

There are a number of programs for youth who travel, with chaperons, by bus to Barrie or Collingwood where they receive professional instruction ranging from beginners to instructors-in-training."

The Wednesday "adult getaway" program includes transportation to ski clubs in Collingwood, including Devils Glen, Alpine, Osler, Craigleith and Georgian Peaks. Gorski provides morning coffee or tea on the way up, lessons at all levels for small groups and an apres-ski party before heading home.

There are also special programs for the spring break and a spring camp of guided skiing including snowshoeing and nightly activities on Mont Tremblant.

Gorski says the name of the game is "make it fun." He believes in skill development and stresses that "safety always comes first." For those who don't want to make the investment in equipment, he can provide you with rentals.

Gorski, from Montreal, where his mother owned a ski school, began skiing at a young age. He received a Bachelor of Commerce degree from Concordia and an MBA from McMaster University in entrepreneurial studies. A major assignment in graduate school was to plan a new business and Gorski selected a ski school.

Before entering graduate school, however, he took off four years and taught skiing full time at Mont Tremblant, Banff and in Switzerland.

Shortly after graduation, in 1984 he moved to Toronto and organized the Snowhawks Ski School for Children. He had 75 children the first year. His success led to the expansion of the junior and the creation of the adult program.

His partner is his wife, Heather Siderson-Gorski whom he met while she was one of his instructors "I broke one of my rules — never to go out with staff."

The Gorskis have three children: seven months, three and four years of age and the older ones are already on skis.

Eight years ago he started Snowhawks Ski School in Ottawa with a majority owner, Harvey Brodkin.

Gorski advises parents to begin young children in classes at local ski facilities such as Toronto's Earl Bales Park where equipment and lessons are available by the hour. This, he says, prepares children for a day ski program.

He hopes to start a ski and snowboarding school in the Vancouver area. "Many skiers are turning to snowboarding", he says.

About families

Dear Susan,

I recently went on a march for breast cancer with a friend. We were shocked to see how poorly the Jewish community was represented. We concluded that some people only volunteer their time when their photos will appear in the newspaper. What can we do about this apathy?

Dear Reader,

Congratulations to you and your friend for participating in the walk for cancer. By giving of your time and yourself you made a meaningful contribution to a worthwhile cause.

People choose different ways to support the causes in which they believe. Some write out a cheque while others become actively involved with the organization itself.

Both you and your friend experienced dismay and disappointment because of what you perceived as a lack of commitment by your peers to an important cause. It is true that there are some people who do volunteer work for narrow, narcissistic reasons. There is, however, a large army of people who quietly do important, useful volunteer work behind the scenes, unnoticed by anyone. Their only reward is knowing that they are making a difference.

I think it is up to families to instil the idea that we are all part of a community and that we have an obligation to help each other. This is not a terribly new idea – every religion tells us that the well-off should help the less fortunate, and before the government took on the task, it was up to each community to look after its marginal, elderly and less capable members.

As a parent, you can teach your children how they can learn to respect others by giving of themselves. You might consider involving your own children in the walkathon next year. If you feel your community lacks involvement and commitment, the most effective, appropriate response is to encourage involvement and commitment in that portion of your community you can most influence – your family.

Susan Leventhal is a family, marital and individual therapist, who has been practising for more than 17 years.

14th century Haggadah heads to Hebrew U library

By ALISSA KAPLAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — A rare medieval Haggadah will soon head for its new home — the National Library at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

The 14th-century illuminated Wolf Haggadah will arrive in midJanuary as a result of a joint effort by the World Jewish Congress (WJC) and the Polish government, said Elan Steinberg, executive director of the WJC.

In addition, Steinberg announced as part of the agreement with the government of Poland, the 23-foot cross on display at Auschwitz along with other religious symbols on display in the former Carmelite convent at the camp will be removed "within days."

The fate of the Haggadah, worth more than $1 million, has been in question for years.

Albert Wolf, a German Jew who died in 1907, bequeathed it to the Berlin Jewish community. The Nazis stole it in 1938, and it was discovered in 1944 by Russian troops in Poland. The Russians turned it over to the Historical Institute in Poland.

The claims surrounding its ownership then leads to a Montreal man, Nathan Hecht, who claimed to have bought it and attempted in 1989 to have it sold by a Swiss auction house.

Acting on behalf of the East and West Berlin Jewish communities, the WJC succeeded in 1990 in having the Geneva courts seize the Haggadah to prevent its auction.

At that time the Polish government and the WJC reached an agreement to jointly contest any appeals of the decision preventing the auction of the Hagaddah. If successful, they would send the Hadaddah to Israel for official display and safekeeping. Steinberg characterized the agreement between the Polish government and the WJC as a "good-faith gesture".

Last year, on Oct. 18, after lengthy legal proceedings, a Geneva court upheld the decision prohibiting the sale of the manuscript and decided that the Haggadah could be officially sent to Israel.

When released from the custody of the court, The Haggadah will first be be taken to the Polish Embassy in Bern. It will then be transported to Israel by Tadeusz Polak, Polish undersecretary of state at the Culture and Art Ministry, who took part in the New York meeting with the WJC; the Israeli ambassador and WJC representatives.

In Israel, the Haggadah will be officially handed over to the National Library at a ceremony to be attended by top officials of the Polish government, Steinberg said.

Hecht told The CJN he paid "a lot" for the Hagaddah but that "it doesn't look like" he will be pursuing the matter any further.

King Hussein mediates Hebron talks

End of negotiations near

By DAVID MAKOVSKY AND JON IMMANUEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Jordan's King Hussein secured a key Palestinian concession last Sunday that appears to have brought the sides closer to a Hebron agreement. He then flew from Gaza to Tel Aviv for a meeting with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

"We can envision the end of the negotiations in sight," Netanyahu said after meeting with King Hussein. "Because of the important initiative His Majesty took, we have made considerable progress."

Earlier, in Gaza, Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat agreed to Hussein's proposal that Israel could prolong its three-stage withdrawal from West Bank rural areas, narrowing the gap on the key sticking point in the talks, according to a PA official.

In Tel Aviv, Netanyahu, King Hussein and U.S. special envoy Dennis Ross were upbeat but noncommittal, saying some work remained.

"I leave here confident that everything will move in the right direction...a fresh beginning to continue the work to achieve the kind of peace and the kind of future we seek," King Hussein told reporters after a 90-minute meeting with Netanyahu.

"We are closer than we were," said Ross, adding that he would now remain in the region, despite earlier plans by the U.S. Embassy to have him return to Washington.

The proposal was formulated during King Hussein's visit to Gaza, his first since 1967, for talks with Arafat. The compromise was worked out during seven hours of talks in Gaza and came after phone calls to Netanyahu, U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher, Ross and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

An official in the Prime Minister's Office (PMO) saluted King Hussein. "One has to admire the king, who is willing to risk his prestige by trying to reach an agreement, just as he did by attending the Washington summit" several months ago, he said.

According to the PMO, Jordanian officials had notified Jerusalem that the king would be visiting Gaza, and if successful in his peacemaking efforts, he would be amenable to meeting Netanyahu later in the day.

Anti-Semitic articles appear in Canadian Arab press

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In language reminiscent of neo-Nazi publications, an Arab language newspaper in Toronto has published an article condemning the prosecution of Nazi war criminals and suggesting the Holocaust is a lie.

"Where is the human justice" in seeking trials for these men, asks an article in the June 27 issue of Al-Orouba (The Arab) newspaper. "The decision of the government of Canada [was made] under the insistence of a wicked and spiteful Jewish pressure to try very old people. And if these people were Nazis or Jews, they deserve mercy, kindness, pity and compassion. Everyone knows the fulfillment of military orders during wartime is punished by death."

The article goes on to question the Holocaust: "What is the proof for the death of six million Jews in World War II or what is called the Holocaust? And if these lies are true as they claim, the Soviet Union lost 26 million between the military and civilians, so is Jewish blood made of gold while the others' blood is made of brass?"

The article, by A. Sabbagh, said "the continuation of trying these very old people is clear proof of the existence of two qualities the Jews are well known to possess and they are 'don't forgive and don't forget.' These two qualities stayed attached to the Jews since their existence on the face of the earth." The writer goes on to ask why Israel does not try soldiers who participated in the burial of Egyptian prisoners during the 1967 and 1973 wars and asks, "isn't this a clear proof of the double standard by the world society that is under the wicked and poisonous Jewish influence?"

The article, written in Arabic, was translated by Sasson Mayer, a Jew of Iraqi origin. Mayer, who has lived in Toronto for 30 years, said

UFOs Don't Arrive

JERUSALEM – Thousands of Israelis took to their rooftops last week, scanning the skies for UFOs whose arrival was predicted by an Israeli mystic.

Helinor Harar, who predicted the election victory of Benjamin Netanyahu, said the extraterrestrial beings were supposed to land Jan. 5 in Israel.

Theme music from the American television show The X-Files came over loudspeakers for the event.

Harar later told Israeli media that she had a new date for the landing — Feb. 14, Valentine's Day.

TENSION RECEDES IN MIDDLE EAST

Some of the heat appears to have gone out of the Arab build-up towards resumed fighting in the Middle East. In Israel the emphasis has returned to the search of a political solution and more particularly to the expected resumption of a U.S. bid to secure an intermittent Suez Canal settlement.

Israeli leaders are adamant they have paid no advance price for President Nixon's decision to resume Phantom deliveries. Nevertheless, Washington will clearly expect a further demonstration of Israel's "flexibility" as a quid pro quo.

FRANCOPHONE IMMIGRANTS LACK OPPORTUNITIES

French-speaking immigrants from North Africa who have made Montreal the third largest absorption centre after Israel and New York City, find a lack of warmth and personal feeling on the part of some agencies and the general population, according to a study. The report says it is the opinion of many of the newcomers that the community is content to let its agencies meet the tangible needs of food, clothing and shelter but is not interested in making personal contact with them.

Cantor had 'few friends, limited social life'

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — The chair to the right of the cantor's table in the chapel at Beth Israel Synagogue was empty. Books covered the desk, along with a pair of glasses, the last hint that a man respected by the congregation had been there.

Stuart Friedman was gone. The 42-year-old man who served the congregation for the past 30 months as cantor, Hebrew school teacher and choir leader, boarded a plane to his Baltimore home the day before, after being convicted of possession of child pornography, fined and exiled.

"We are still in shock," said Bob Wolman, president of the 107-year-old Halifax Orthodox congregation, wrapping his t'fillin after morning services. "We knew nothing of this until we got a call from police that they had taken the cantor into custody after raiding his apartment."

Wolman called Friedman a "kind and gentle man, extremely cooperative, helpful, dedicated worker. He attended each morning minyan and afternoons too, when he wasn't teaching."

Yet the president says the cantor was "lonely, had no close friends and a limited social life."

Friedman came to Halifax in August 1994. His operatically-trained voice raised the level of services at Beth Israel. He participated in two Halifax concerts, with other cantors, that brought Jewish music to the awareness of the secular public. He sang in London, England recently in a three cantors' concert.

He studied classical music at the Peabody Institute of Music and Towson State University in his home town of Baltimore. His cantorial studies took him to the Belz School of Music at Yeshiva University.

"While we can't make excuses for what was totally inappropriate behavior, we know he wasn't an abuser," said Wolman. "He didn't bother anyone. His problem was his own."

Wolman accompanied Friedman to the airport following his plea and sentencing. "He was remorseful and said he wishes he 'could apologize to the children of the Hebrew school.' We know he didn't do them any harm."

Wolman said the cantor realizes he is ill and needs help and "I feel he'll get it. We're just saddened about what happened."

He said the synagogue will begin a search for a new cantor.

Halifax cantor guilty of possessing child pornography

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — After months of intensive investigation by Canada Customs and Halifax police officials, it took but a few minutes for cantor and Hebrew school teacher Stuart Friedman of Halifax's Beth Israel Synagogue to plead guilty to charges of possessing child pornography and be returned to his native United States.

Friedman, 42, was a teacher, choir director and leader of services at Beth Israel Synagogue since August 1994. Well respected in his synagogue duties, the cantor's private interests were unknown to synagogue officials.

"I'm speechless," said president Robert Wolman. "Our whole congregation is in shock."

"We bought him an airline ticket to Baltimore, told him we'd pack his things and send them to him, and put him on the plane," said one synagogue board member.

Police raided Friedman's apartment in south end Halifax, Jan. 6, after securing a search warrant. They discovered, and took as evidence, two computers, dozens of computer discs containing pornographic material, a few sets of handcuffs, books, more than 300 explicit photos and over 50 pornographic video tapes and scores of magazines.

"It was disgusting," said Const. Gary Martin, public affairs officer of the Halifax Regional Municipality Police Department. "The discs showed explicit pictures of young boys in sexual acts, covering every form of pornography. Ninety percent of it was obtained indirectly or directly from the Internet."

He said there were photos of children and a concern was that he may have been taking local photos. "We're trying to find out if locals are in these pictures."

After the plea and sentencing, defence lawyer Joel Pink emphatically told reporters no local children were in the pictures. He and Wolman had examined the photos prior to Friedman's court appearance. Friedman taught Hebrew school and conducted bar mitzvah classes at the synagogue.

Crown attorney Frank Hoskins said Friedman was cooperative with police when they entered his apartment. "He had only used the photographs for his own sexual fantasies. His intent was possession, not distribution or selling."

Friedman, not married, helped police further their investigation by providing information to bring more like-minded individuals forward.

Outside court, a police officer told reporters the investigation is international in scope and far from over.

"We're pursuing every angle. He's not the only person involved. The investigation involves law enforcement officials in Canada and the United States."

In addition to the fine, Friedman forfeited his computers, valued at a total of $2,700. He said privately later that he realizes he has an illness and will seek help.

When reporters suggested the fine might be lenient for such a crime, police officer Martin said, "This individual has lost more in his standing in his own community than just $2,000.

Synagogue officials were scheduled to meet with parents of bar mitzvah boys from the past two years in their own investigation of the cantor's activities. But it was strongly felt he did not act improperly with his students.

'Intensive political dialogue is necessary'

Next week, on Jan. 20, Israel's new ambassador to Canada, David Sultan and his wife, Adina, will be in Toronto. The ambassador will be speaking to the community from the dais of the Beth Tzedec Congregation. It will be their first official visit to Toronto and his first official presentation.

The ambassador was gracious enough to interrupt a warm weather vacation to allow The CJN to speak with him by telephone. We reproduce the interview as a way of "introducing" the ambassador to our readers.

CJN: Have you met with Lloyd Axworthy yet?

Sultan: Yes I have. We had a long chat. I tried to convey to him the complexity of the current situation [in the peace process].

In the near future, we hope that Mr. Axworthy and Mr. Levy [David Levy, Israel's foreign minister] will be able to exchange visits. In fact, visits had been arranged, but pressing matters, namely in Zaire and in Hebron, arose to postpone them.

CJN: How would you describe Israel's relations with Canada?

Sultan: Good relations between Canada and Israel are a tradition, but there is always room for improvement. We would like to see the two countries defying the geographical distance between us by moving even closer [on a bilateral level].

Politically, we should intensify the dialogue. It would be of benefit to both sides.

As you know, Canada has interests in our region and is involved in the peace process through its participation in peace keeping forces, her active role in the multilateral process and financial assistance to the Palestinians.

We, of course, welcome all that and would like to see the Canadian role continuing.

At the same time, I would say that Canadian involvement in the peace process means that there is a growing number of subjects that are of increasingly common interest to our two countries. Thus, intensive political dialogue is necessary to prevent misunderstandings. We want to prevent quick condemnation of Israel in situations which are delicate, sensitive and complex.

CJN: How would you describe your ambassadorship in Egypt?

Sultan: Egypt was a very special experience. For an Israeli diplomat, the assignment in Cairo is different from any other. In Cairo, the task directly involves the building of a peaceful relationship between us and our neighbors.

The task was difficult, not in the least because right from the beginning, Israel and Egypt had different approaches toward normalization of relations. For us, peace and normal relations were the aim and the goal, whereas for them, it was a price they had to pay for getting back the Sinai.

It was a great challenge and a great privilege. For me, having been born in Egypt, there was also a personal angle. When my family immigrated to Israel in 1949, I was 11 years old. I never thought I would come back to Egypt as the representative of the Jewish state. It was the closing of a circle.

CJN: During your term in Cairo the "episode" arose involving the alleged mistreatment of Egyptian prisoners of war from the Sinai campaign in 1956. Some Egyptian media even directed some of the allegations at you. Can you tell us anything about that?

Sultan: To be sure, the allegations were not pleasant. They came from the opposition. They did not come from government officials. But we agreed that it was better not to dig up old wounds from the past.

CJN: Do you wish to impart any specific message to the Canadian Jewish community?

Sultan: I am more concerned with Jewish continuity in the Diaspora than with the intensity of the internal debates within Israel generated by the peace process. The internal debates in Israel will ease once the peace process comes to fruition. But where will the Diaspora be in terms of Jewish continuity?

In fact, my remarks next week in Toronto will focus on Israel-Diaspora relations.

I would like to work closely with the Canadian Jewish community. I know the community in Canada is a vibrant, confident, proud and committed one. Maintaining and hopefully strengthening the bonds uniting us will be a major priority.

CJN: What do you see when you imagine the year 2000?

Sultan: For the long run, I am very optimistic. We will have a comprehensive peace, close cooperation among neighbors for the economic flowering and benefit of all the countries in the region. There is no other way.

The career of an Ambassador

David Sultan was born in Cairo, Egypt in 1938. His family immigrated to Israel in 1949. He and his wife Adina have two children.

After serving in the IDF, he was the first secretary in Abidjan, Ivory Coast. Since then:

- 1974 to 1979: counsellor in The Hague, Netherlands.
- 1979 to 1981: director of division in the Foreign Ministry's Centre for Political Research.
- 1982: head of the Israeli Interest Office in Nairobi, Kenya.
- 1983 and 1985: minister-counsellor in Cairo.
- 1985 to 1987: consul general in Milan, Italy.
- 1987 to 1989: director of the cabinet of the director-general for the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.
- 1989 to 1992: deputy director general of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.
- 1992 to 1996: ambassador to Egypt.

Police probing anti-Semitic telephone messages

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Metro Toronto Police's hate crimes unit is asking for the Jewish community's help in catching the people or person responsible for leaving bizarre anti-Semitic telephone messages at a number of businesses.

The unit has received seven complaints to date, but there have likely been many more unreported instances, Det. John Monroe told The CJN.

The messages began in October and have been left after and before working hours at several Jewish-owned or operated businesses around Metro, Monroe said.

The recordings are of a male voice warning that "anti-Christs" and "Hebrew Satanists" are going to be "annihilated."

Monroe said there's "a good chance" the same person has been leaving the messages.

He's advising anyone who receives the message to press the star sign on their telephone dialing pad, followed by pressing 57. That, he said, would trace the call, even to a number that has been blocked.

But that only works, he explained, if the message is the last one left on an answering machine. Calls are more difficult to trace when a switchboard forwards them to voice-mail, he said.

"We're really concerned about this," Monroe said. "The calls are not threatening or harassing anyone personally as defined in the Criminal Code. But people getting them feel threatened and intimidated nonetheless."

He said police are talking to Crown prosecutors to find a section of the Criminal Code under which the caller could be prosecuted.

Bernie Farber of Canadian Jewish Congress said a few people who were targeted for the calls were scared.

"While I don't believe there's anything to be scared of, these calls are disconcerting and malicious," Farber said.

Rabbi Jay Kelman helping couples purchase homes

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Jay Kelman

TORONTO — Rabbi Jay Kelman, associate rabbi of Beth Jacob Synagogue in North York, is pressing forward in his attempts to revitalize the shul and the Bathurst Manor community.

The first 10 couples who buy homes in the area, and who commit to become active members of Beth Jacob, will receive a $25,000 loan, interest-free for two years, as well as a percentage off their mortgage, and 40 percent off their legal fees.

Rabbi Kelman told The CJN that he is trying to also offer a discount on moving costs, and a reduced rate membership at the BJC.

"We are trying to create a young, open, energetic, vibrant, centrist Orthodox community in Bathurst Manor," he said.

For many years, he said, young couples buying their first homes have been buying in the Bathurst corridor, especially in Thornhill. But there are many benefits to buying in the manor, he said – it is on the subway line, lots are bigger, there are many rentable basements, and there is good value in the housing market. "You get more for your money," he said.

Rabbi Kelman has other ways to encourage young families to join the synagogue; a junior congregation, Shabbat luncheons, and educational and social programs. In fact, he confided, nine young families, with children, have joined in recent months.

To assist those who are interested, the synagogue is holding a homebuyers' seminar on Feb. 3, which will include a representative from the Toronto Dominion Bank talking about finance.

Teens from small communities prepare for summer in Israel

TORONTO — Twenty-five teenagers from small communities across Ontario took a break in their recent school holidays to come to Toronto for three days of preparation for their participation in the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) three-year High School Outreach Program, a five-week summer study tour in Israel.

Leanne Rosen, who was attending her first kallah (gathering) since her appointment as program coordinator last summer, said she was "delighted" to see and hear how much the participants had been absorbing through home study.

At the weekend conclave, " the teenagers were absolutely captivated by the talks on what to expect in Israel," she said.

As part of its mandate, CJC Ontario region is committed to preserving and strengthening Jewish life in small communities ranging in size from one to 250 families. Identifying the need for Jewish education and continuity in these communities, CJC launched the outreach program, now in its fourth three-year cycle.

Students learn by correspondence from material sent out by Congress and from periodic visits by CJC professionals. Twice yearly, teenagers from places including Sault St. Marie, Timmins, Kingston and St. Catharines – come together at a weekend kallah for group study.

"Now that we are two years into the program, the youngsters have jelled into a cohesive unit — one extremely enthusiastic about the forthcoming trip to Israel," said Jennifer Turack, CJC director of the Community Services and Youth Activities Department that supervises the outreach project.

At the recent kallah entitled Israel: Back to the Future, speakers videos and group activities helped prepare the teenagers for their forthcoming trip.

Michael Soberman of the Canada-Israel Experience Centre gave a talk on what to expect. Volunteers Saul Cohen, Janna Cohen, Robin Hollinger and Michael Nadler spoke of their own experiences, and about some specific features of Israeli life.

The kallah also included Shabbat services; team games such as "Jewpardy," a takeoff of the popular television show Jeopardy featuring questions about Israel and Israeli heroes and heroines, and Jewish history; and crafts involving the creation of hand-decorated prayers for travel.

Leah Kon, 16, of Guelph said that this kallah "stressed the importance of our connection to Israel in solidifying our Jewish identity. Specifically, we were informed about the many accomplishments of Israel and the Israelis. During the weekend, we have come together as a group, and that's great because we are going to have to rely on each other when we are in Israel."

Daniel Schwartz-Narbonne, 14, of Kingston got the impression from the speakers that in Israel, they should be ready "for individuals who are more intense and more likely to tell you exactly what they think and feel. I am really looking forward to our trip, especially the social aspects of meeting young Israelis of our age group."

Shanna Park, 15, of Sault Ste. Marie said she is particularly enjoying the outreach program because of the opportunity to become friends with other Jewish youngsters who understand the experience of living in small communities.

Unlike most of his fellow participants, Avrum Hollinger, 14, of Guelph has already toured Israel. "What was special for me is visiting the sites where all these Bible stories took place," he said.

The snake turns

On Dec. 18, a grenade was thrown at a bus carrying soldiers in Lebanon. One soldier was killed. A week later, a bomb exploded near military intelligence headquarters in the Bekaa Valley killing two more soldiers. Then, in an even bolder and deadlier attack a bus carrying civilians was bombed in the heart of the capital on New Year's Eve killing at least 13 passengers.

The scene described could very well apply to the determined but craven terror directed at Israel. But it does not. This time the targets of the bombings were Syrians.

As Steve Rodan and Jacob Dallal recently wrote in the Jerusalem Post, "After more than a quarter of a century in power, the question is who wants to harm Assad and why does he think this is only the beginning? The suspects, as well as the reason, are numerous."

Even a cursory assessment of the situation yields at least six possible "candidates" for the terror: Lebanese Christians who revile the Syrians for having taken away their country; Turkey, which is fed up with Syria for supporting the PKK Kurdish rebel struggle; Islamic fundamentalists in Syria who regard Assad and his minority Alawite sect as far too liberal and who are tied into the secret web spun of mutual support and deceit by Iran's Revolutionary Guard and the Moslem Brotherhood; Iraq, one of Syria's traditional enemies; Iran, one of Syria's traditional allies with whom relations are somewhat tense at the moment due to current Persian Gulf political expediencies and south Lebanon disagreements; and even Assad's fellow Alawites among whom are rivals always eager and ready to overthrow the Syrian president.

Eventually responsibility for the bombing in Damascus was "claimed" by the Islamic Movement for Change, apparently a newly formed fundamentalist group now taking its place alongside the cadre of the radical, religious killers.

After the Dec. 31 bus bombing in Damascus, Syria immediately though perfunctorily accused Israel of perpetrating the atrocity. Noted Israeli military analyst Ze'ev Schiff correctly pointed out that the fact Syria blamed Israel demonstrated confusion in the president's palace and among his generals.

No one should feel smug at the carnage in Damascus. It is not the vulnerability of the regime that saddens us but the sheer, almost gleeful, disregard for the sanctity of human life. Nowhere in the Middle East has this grisly evil been more evident recently than in Algeria. In the name of their God, Islamic fundamentalist "rebels" have been slaughtering innocent men, women and children. Scores of thousands of people have been killed in Algeria in the fundamentalists' war against the government. But the vulnerability of some regimes is also worrisome. The Iranian-backed Moslem Brotherhoods are actively seditious in Jordan and in Egypt.

Last week in Israel, 13 people were injured as a result of two bombs that exploded in south Tel Aviv. Palestinian sources said the garbage can bombings appeared to be the work of George Habash's Syrian-backed Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine. In south Lebanon, an Israeli soldier was killed and more than a dozen injured in clashes with Iranian-backed Hezbollah.

The snake of terrorism that feeds on the blood of innocents that Syria has nurtured and to this day still helps sustain, has now turned on itself. But it must be eradicated.

With goodwill and cooperation among Middle Eastern nations, and a clear understanding of their true shared, common interests, it could be done.

This Week in Canadian Jewish History

Jan. 16, 1950 CTV broadcast journalist Sandie Rinaldo was born. In 1980 she became the first woman in Canada to anchor a network newscast on a daily basis. (Canadian Jewish Congress Archives)

Their daughter guarded the Golan

After having read Shirley Stutz's guest column entitled "On Guard For Israel" (CJN, Dec. 5), I felt compelled to give her a Yasher Koach and to send her the following message.

In many ways, my wife and I felt just as you do. Our daughter undertook the same path as your son, that is as a chayelet bodeda back in the years '91-'93.

We too felt passionately every recrimination in regards to Zionism, every barb by left-leaning Jews, Israelis and gentiles alike, with respect to the Golan and we too felt every threat both real and perceived by the various enemies who doubted the Golan, which our daughter, Zoe, was so loyally guarding. We too owed the telephone company over-much, (specially frustrated when there were weak connections), and we also envied those Israeli soldiers who could return home to their various families on weekend leave.

Somehow we managed to weather the storm and, truth be it known, the return of our warrior daughter has further cemented our love for each other and our collective desire and love for all of Israel.

Silent German woman kept him alive

Fran Klodawsky's letter of Dec. 19 merits an answer for her thoughts "on our fight against Holocaust deniers and assorted rabble of neo-Nazis and the old war criminals who found haven in this God-blessed country."

The government through the years knew about them but shamefully did nothing about them, letting them live among their intended victims who survived; it still is dragging its feet in prosecuting them. The letter says that there were Germans who made some difference by saying "no" to the accepted Nazi hatred, by helping the enslaved people by small deeds where the difference between life and death meant a bite of bread given to her mother.

I had the same experience in the factory where 1,000 toiled daily and were dying of hunger and abuse. A German woman who was working not far from me got my attention by hinting by expressions to a place where I noticed a piece of paper. She never spoke to me but I found this same paper containing a slice of bread for several months. When she fell ill, my hunger returned.

Deplores shooting of Palestinians

The recent shooting of Palestinians in a crowded market in Hebron by the young, religious fanatic Israeli soldier, Noam Friedman, will immediately trigger painful memories among Jews around the world of the horrifying shooting death of Yitzhak Rabin by Yigal Amir just 16 months ago.

Perhaps it is high time that Israeli society start doing some soul searching and ask itself some important questions.

In the case of Friedman, the IDF should have taken more cautious measures before recruiting such a fanatic in its ranks knowing his past history and background. Perhaps Israeli Jews and those in the Diaspora are starting to see a disturbing trend among a small percentage of Jews, who by acting alone, think that they have the God-given right to change the course of history.

Another salvo on Reading Hebron

In response to Ioan Davies' letter criticizing my comments on Jason Sherman's Reading Hebron:

First, Israel is decidedly not, as Davies claims, a 'text, provided for us openly on TV, radio and film' to be 'read, carefully' in order to understand it. Israel is, in fact, a true-to-life nation-state composed of true-to-life human beings dealing with the very complex problems of real life. And as much as I must commend Davies and Sherman for their love of reading, I expect that real-life will one day welcome them, too, into its complex and often muddied reality.

Secondly, I have grave doubts as to whether Sherman knows his Prophets (as Davies claims), and challenge Davies himself (as he has me) to put his Talmudic defence of Reading Hebron before the eyes of what should be an eager and curious CJN readership.

That is, of course, if he can read Aramaic.

Perspectives

Raise the authentic Orthodox voice of reason and love

By RABBI MAURY KELMAN

Perhaps the greatest secret in the survival of the Jewish people through millennia of persecution and upheaval has been our uncanny common sense. From Abraham's smooth business dealings with the hard driving Hittites, to Mordechai and Esther's clear grasp of political reality, to our contemporary rabbis' creative solutions for the modern challenges to Judaism, we have always used our legendary Jewish kop to survive and flourish as a tiny minority. Yet, as an Orthodox Jew surveying the changing landscape of Jewish life over the last few years. I fear that segments within the Orthodox community have replaced common sense with a perilous myopia.

While all members of society must balance their individual and communal aspirations, a seriously committed Jew faces a much greater task. From its earliest days, Judaism has vigorously emphasized its obligations to the community, often at the expense of personal goals. Our Talmudic rabbis teach that in helping others, whether it's by sharing our wealth with the needy, visiting the sick, comforting the mourner or giving joy to a bride and groom, we participate in acts of imitatio Dei. Our communal obligations are thus infused with divine echoes animating our daily lives with spiritual rewards. We are not only being nice people when we spend 20 minutes helping an elderly person get home safely, we transcend our own desires and make God more accessible in this world. Without proper perspective and guidance, however, these communal responsibilities can lead to an unhealthy tension: How can I do anything for myself when there are so many problems just outside my comfortable home?

Societal responsibilities

Lately, society has displayed a slight uneasiness with the "me first" syndrome that has often encapsulated Western culture. Overall, however, the major thrust of modern man is to pursue personal success while downplaying societal responsibilities. Ironically, one can detect a similar tendency in the religious sphere among minority elements of Orthodox Jewry. Thus, certain Jews, in their justified desire to create a spiritual sanctuary for themselves and their families, unwittingly create the false impression that Orthodox Jews care less about our unaffiliated brothers and sisters than about other observant Jews. And yet, while this attitude, especially in Israel, has led to great dissension, it is important to understand the sincere motivation that drives this behavior.

Certain Orthodox Jews view the temptations of Western culture as a direct threat to the health of traditional Judaism and feel that in order to ensure the survival of Judaism we must distance ourselves as much as possible from potential dangerous influences. The consequences of this fear can, however, lead to the tragic "us first" conclusion: "Since we are ensuring the survival of a strong Orthodoxy, we have to take care of our own religious needs before we worry about the implications of our actions for less committed Jews."

While this unfortunate approach has had a deleterious effect throughout the Jewish world, it is most evident in Israel, a sad fact which the international press continues to document. The months since the Israeli election provide a telling case study for the state of this small, yet greatly publicized, minority of contemporary Orthodoxy. In the days following the election results, many Orthodox Israeli Jews exulted in a giddy euphoria, pointing to the 23 "religious" Knesset seats as evidence of the public's disdain for the alleged anti-religious bias of the previous government. From the towns of Judea and Samaria, through the study halls of Mea Shearim, Orthodox Jews inhaled the sweet fragrance of victory that infused them with vigor and new-found confidence.

And truly, the election results were not surprising. One had sensed a growing discomfort among average Israelis with the rapid import of Western culture and its concomitant erosion of authentic Jewish culture. Madonna, McDonald's and MTV, along with their Friends, such as Seinfeld and Michael Jordan, have become touchstones for many young Israelis searching for a cultural identity. Many of the secular Israelis I know are alarmed at the virtual ignorance that Israeli youth and young adults display of anything Jewish. Recently a public high school principal uncharacteristically asked me to run a special Jewish program at his school, sheepishly explaining that his pupils "know nothing about Judaism."

This atmosphere, together with the election results, have accorded Orthodox Jews a wonderful opportunity. But how have we used it? Instead of reaching out to alienated Jews, we continue to drive them away with disputes over cars on Shabbat. A crazed band of hooligans finds sport in attacks on women not dressed modestly enough for their intrusive eyes. And of course, CNN and the Toronto Star eagerly expose our dirty laundry to a worldwide audience who wonder why Jews don't get along with one another.

What has happened to our common sense? What has happened to Judaism's deeply rooted and cultivated traditions of tolerance and love for all Jews, and indeed all mankind? If we care about reaching the majority of the Jewish people, the temperate Orthodox minority must vociferously reject the opinions of these splinter groups who unwittingly bring shame to our Torah and teachings through their divisive and selfish actions.

Unfortunately, the plague of extremism has spread to other Jewish communities. When I was growing up in Toronto, I felt that a certain sense of unity pervaded all Jews from the left to the right in what was then a more limited spectrum. Now, whenever I return to my home town, I detect an increasing insularity among some Orthodox Jews marked by a proliferation of new schools and shuls that focus inwardly at distinct subgroups within the Orthodox world.

Beyond the question of schools and shuls however, lies the more pressing issue of attitude. It is quite convenient to blame Jewish ignorance and apathy upon the evils of the outside world, while warning that unless we replace our global village with a hermetically closed shtetl, we will continue to lose Jews to seductive secularism. More demanding, however is the question that every concerned Orthodox Jew must ask him or herself: Am I doing even the minimum to reach out to other Jews or am I more concerned with my own religious world?

No axe to grind

In fact, both common sense and Halachah demand that we approach all Jews, no matter how distant or even antagonistic, with a sense of understanding and respect. As has been stressed by many great rabbis, no Jew, no matter how hostile, can be deemed a rasha or wicked person. The illustrious Chazon Ish, the 20th century sage of B'nei Brak who is not often identified with liberal, politically correct causes, quotes other scholars who maintain that we are actually commanded to love sinful Jews. This decision is based upon the Talmudic position (Arachin 16B) that we have lost the ability to rebuke our fellow Jews, indicating that even the most impious of Jews cannot be deemed fully culpable for their transgressions of Jewish Law.

This is especially true of both contemporary Israel and Judaism. The vast majority of Jews today have no a priori axe to grind with Judaism. Today's typical modern Jewish child grows up in a secular world with barely committed Jewish parents, inheriting few Jewish roots while receiving his/her cultural nourishment from popular media and entertainment. While in North America most Jewish adults remain apathetic to their heritage, the best that we can usually hope for in Israel is that by the time these typical Jews begin to make independent decisions, they will remain only apathetic and not become hostile to Judaism.

It is not too late to attract Jews to a vivacious, open Orthodoxy. We must first, however, heed the exquisite words of the great 19th-century rabbi of Volozhin, Naphtali Tzvi Yehuda Berlin (Netziv). Living in a society not overly accepting to Jews, this perceptive hero nevertheless implores us in his introduction to Genesis to follow the tolerant and open paths of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and reject the crooked ways of supposedly pious people who claim that only their approach is correct, castigating all others who don't share their views. This path, the Netziv proves, leads to spiritual death and physical destruction.

The overwhelming majority of Orthodox Jews across the spectrum cares deeply for all Jews, but as in most cases, the voices of reason and Kiddush HaShem (glorification of God's name) have too often been muted by a vociferous and skewed minority. Those who seek Jewish continuity and education for Jews of all denominations and backgrounds must raise the authentic Orthodox voices of reason and love.

Many Jews sense a spiritual vacuum in contemporary Israeli and North American culture and, if the Israeli election results are even a slight indication, have begun to search for these Jewish routes. We now have a splendid opportunity to create a renaissance of Jewish identification and learning. Let us act immediately to banish the discord of hate and rhetoric and replace it with the melodious sounds of diverse Jews joining together in a symphony of sensitivity and respect.

Rabbi Kelman is the director of KEDMA, an international organization for observant students, and rabbi of Kehillat Moriah, a new synagogue in Jerusalem.

A question of unity

The possibility of a national unity government has been discussed in Israel since last May's election. For many who feel that the government has not been effective in its leadership on domestic issues or in the peace process, a unity government is viewed as a panacea that can guarantee a broad base of support for the government and that, in turn, forces the government to moderate its positions and move toward the centre of the political map.

By Shira Herzog in Toronto

Israel has had three experiences with national unity governments.

In 1967, during the tension-filled weeks preceding the Six Day War, then prime minister Levi Eshkol invited Gahal, the forerunner of Likud, to join the government. In fact, Eshkol was forced to do so by Rafi, a breakaway faction from Mapai (the forerunner of Labor). In the weeks prior to the war, when it seemed that Eshkol, who also served as defence minister, was losing the confidence of the people, he needed Moshe Dayan of Rafi by his side. Rafi's condition for joining the coalition was the addition of Gahal and its leader, Menachem Begin, in an effort to weaken Mapai.

The unity government was important during the war and its aftermath. But from a political point of view, Eshkol and his party were weakened. Dayan, and not Eshkol, was viewed as the great hero of the war. And Gahal, which had been delegitimized by the Mapai establishment in the past, had been successful in conferring a new legitimacy upon itself. The decline of Mapai, which culminated 10 years later in its first defeat at the polls, can be traced to the unity government of 1967.

In 1984, Shimon Peres and Yitzhak Shamir joined forces in a unity government because neither of them could muster a majority in the Knesset that would allow his party to form a government. Once formed, the 1984 government was able to act on two fronts decisively and courageously. It withdrew the IDF from Lebanon, where it had been involved since 1982, and it reduced inflation to a single digit figure.

In 1988, a similar deadlock in the election results led to the formation of yet another unity government by Peres and Shamir. This time around, the record was not nearly as spectacular. The government was unable to act on the peace front in the aftermath of the intifadah, leading some commentators to name it "a government of national paralysis." At the same time, in a blow to parliamentary democracy, the Israeli parliament functioned without an effective opposition for eight years. This experience spawned an intense national debate on electoral reform that resulted in the direct elections for the prime minister, starting in 1996.

Today, Peres and Benjamin Netanyahu both have political and substantive reasons for considering a unity government. Peres claims that only a broad coalition can attenuate the pressures on Netanyahu from the right and can salvage the Oslo process. But his political interest is transparent. In a broad coalition, he can continue to play a central role on the political stage, at least until the year 2000. Although he has announced that he will not seek the leadership of the party in the June 1997 leadership convention, his seat in a unity government will be assured beyond the leadership change.

Netanyahu, for his part, weakens the opposition just by talking about the prospect of a unity government. He also subdues his own right flank by appearing to entertain the notion of a coalition with the "left." But Netanyahu's true interests are not clear. If, after the Hebron redeployment, he wants, or is pressured, to continue the process and loses support from the right, he will likely want to bring Labor into the government, thereby moving himself to the centre. If, on the other hand, he prefers not to move forward in the peace process, he will have no interest in broadening his parliamentary base through concessions to Labor. By continuing to keep the idea alive, Natanyahu also introduces an element of tension into the relationship between Peres and Ehud Barak, the chief contender for the leadership of Labor. Barak opposes any move that will perpetuate the status quo of Peres' leadership of the party.

History has shown a unity government can be effective on issues on which there is broad consensus, but is ineffectual when the partners differ in their fundamental approach. If Netanyahu forms a broad coalition, it will signal his interest in moving towards a new consensus of the moderate right and left, while leaving ideological conflicts to the margins of the political spectrum.

Diaspora or galut?

Next to the peace process, another issue is perhaps the most crucial question for the Jewish people inside and outside of Israel. It is the gap that has developed between Israel and the Diaspora.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Outside of Israel the gap is pragmatic and not ideological. Communities in most countries suffer from a constriction of funds, and the conviction is spreading that more of the money being collected for enterprises such as United Israel Appeal must to a significant degree be utilized at home in order to ensure Jewish continuity.

This is true for Canada as it is for the United States. We owe it to ourselves (so the thinking goes) to strengthen the sense of Jewishness at home. We have to take care of our institutions first and foremost or else there will be no one around tomorrow to support Israel.

Furthermore, there is a widespread belief that Israel can no longer be considered the poor cousin who needs our charitable dollars, monies which are sorely needed here.

Thirdly, of course, there is the debate over the peace process itself. Some welcome the policies of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, while others consider them to be a prescription for war, not peace.

Fourthly, our younger people do not have the same emotional attachment to Israel as we and our parents did. For us Israel could do no wrong, it was the beloved with no blemish. We scanned the news for the word "Israel" and rejoiced or suffered with every item we read or heard. Today's generation no longer views Israel as the victim it once was; rather, it is seen as a society with foibles found everywhere. With Jewish ties weakening generally, our connection to Israel, too, is bound to suffer. Yes, there still is love and respect, but it is not the way it once was.

So much for the Diaspora side of the coin. But it is not only here that the gap exists. It can be observed in Israel as well. Many Israelis believe that the Diaspora community is in fact living in self-imposed exile, and therefore is not merely a community geographically dispersed throughout the world (t'futzot) but, literally, has chosen galut. In that view, those who live in galut will either return to Israel or disappear altogether — and in that sense, they are becoming increasingly irrelevant to Israel. As long as the United States is the reigning world power, Washington still plays a role and American Jews have some role to play. But that too will diminish in time, especially as demographic shifts diminish Jewish importance to the administration in the United States.

There are those who believe that even if a serious development somewhere in the world would put Jews in that country at risk, Israelis would pay little attention and simply say: "They should have come to Israel before this happened." Others disagree, and think that such an incident would rekindle the basic instinct of Jews in Israel as everywhere else.

These things are now being discussed here and there, especially in universities. But it is high time that the issue be moved to the public. If these facts have not as yet surfaced at home, they will tomorrow, and they beg for attention.

Jewish studies go on-line

Scholars in the field of Jewish studies have begun to use the Internet to create discussion groups in which questions and answers on various topics are exchanged.

On the surface, the major benefit is that these groups can connect Jewish scholars instantly with a large pool of other scholars, who, if they have the time and the patience, might be prepared to help out a colleague with a specific question. In this limited sense it beats a university reference librarian, since respondents are likely to be specialists in the field.

By Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

Recent queries have ranged far and wide. One scholar was curious to know whether the percentage of Jewish deaths during the Black Death was lower or higher than that for non-Jews. Another wondered about the root of the tradition in which observant Jews did not study Torah on Christimas.

Chanukah prompted a host of discussion topics. One (initiated by me) dealt with preferences for side dishes to be eaten with latkes. Respondents ranged from purists who stood steadfastly with sour cream or applesauce, to the innovators (assimilationists?), who dabbled in ketchup, jams, mushrooms and trendier, perhaps healthier alternatives. Clearly, passions were aroused. When it comes to Jewish identity, food is not a trivial matter.

Other Chanukah debates concerned the basis for and propriety of the public display of the chanukiah (for example, on car roofs). Another debate focused on the true meaning of the holiday. Many commentators made the point that the real clash was less between the Syrians and the Jews, and more between the Hellenizing Jews and the more traditionalist Maccabbees. It is ironic that the many North American Jews who celebrate Chanukah, themselves far from traditional, fail to recognize the extent to which they (actually, this is true for most Jews) are modern day versions of quasi-Hellenized Jews.

One of the more controversial issues raised dealt with the issue of whether or how scholars in Jewish studies should be "critical" of elements of Jewish life in their public scholarly work. At a recent meeting of the American Academy of Religion, a Jewish scholar presented a paper entitled The Tenacity of Unreasonable Beliefs in Modern Orthodox Jews: A Psychological Analysis.

One does not have to be Orthodox to take offence at the title. There is an element of disrespect, even derision, in the choice of words. While I have not seen a copy of the paper, the author complained some of his colleagues attacked him for criticizing Jews "in front of the gentiles." He claims he has been made to feel like a medieval apostate criticizing Judaism in public disputations.

On the other hand, one of the cardinal assumptions of any academic research is that nothing is beyond the pale of critical inquiry. And the criteria for scholarship, including the choice of topic and the evaluation of outcomes, are independent of the audience. Indeed, the audience is assumed to be universal, and communal loyalties and insecurities should not play a role. According to this view, scholars need not worry about what gentiles might think or whether anti-Semites might use the research for their own purposes or about possibly hurt feelings.

Nevertheless, the wording seemed insulting. Scholars should avoid disparaging language. Would he have called Hutterite or Methodist beliefs "unreasonable?"

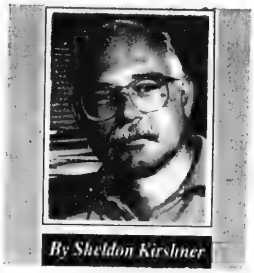
What was surprising about this Internet debate is that these questions are old hat for scholars in the field of Jewish studies. Hannah Arendt and other scholars have explored the role of Jewish councils as possible collaborators in the Nazi genocide. Studies of Jews and crime, or Jews and wife abuse, or the status of women within Judaism or Jewish life, or discrimination against Israeli Arabs or West Bank Palestinians risk painting Jews or Judaism in a negative light, at least from some perspectives. But by and large, the topics are researched.

Responses to Internet queries ought not be confused with rabbinic responsa, though no doubt at some point they will — by an enterprising group of researchers — be subjected to comparable analyses. There is no authoritative consensus which can emerge on any subject of discussion. The medium remains anarchic. What the discussions offer up is a pulse of that segment of the Jewish Studies community which uses the Internet, a snapshot of the concerns and predilections of contemporary Jewish scholars.

The Kirshner File

Leonard Baskin: a printer's printer

Leonard Baskin's books are not in your friendly neighborhood bookshop. They are probably not in your local library. And that's just the way Baskin likes it.



By Sheldon Kirshner

Baskin, a printer, sculptor, painter and engraver, is publisher of the Gehenna Press, one of the most important and elite art presses in the world.

Based in Northhampton, Mass., the Gehenna Press is famous for its beautifully-printed, leather-bound limited-run editions. More often than not, they are bought by university libraries and connoisseurs.

And if you're concerned about price, there is no point even asking. In recent years, Baskin's magnum opuses, printed on the finest handmade paper, have cost between $6,000 and $10,000.

A former yeshivah bocher and the son of an Orthodox rabbi, Baskin acknowledges that his is not the only press of its kind in North America. "But none is nearly as serious or as consistently good as mine," he said in an interview.

In Toronto as a guest of the International Festival of Authors, Baskin founded the Gehenna Press in 1942, when he was a student at Yale University's School of Fine Arts.

Rummaging through a campus library one day, he came upon a book written and illustrated by the renowned British poet William Blake. "It was like being struck by a locomotive," recalled Baskin.

Bent on emulating Blake, Baskin turned his sights on learning the art of printing. Shortly after this epiphany, he published his first book, On A Pyre Of Withered Roses, a collection of his own poetry.

Called up for national service during World War II, Baskin resumed his artistic career in 1946, studying sculpture and printmaking in the United States, France and Italy.

Since then, Baskin's Gehenna Press, which is strong on poetry, has published over 100 titles on topics ranging from feminism to American slavery. Baskin, who did the original cover of Mordecai Richler's The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz, has illustrated the majority of the books and often writes the introduction.

On average, three years elapse from the inception to the publication of a volume. "The books are very special," he said without the slightest trace of humility. "They're not popular artifacts."

For 40 years, the Gehenna Press was in the red. "I subsidized it," he said. But of late, it has turned a modest profit.

Regarded as a master craftsman in calligraphy, drawing and design, Baskin was born in New Jersey in 1922. When he was still a very young man, he attended a craft fair in Manhattan with his brother, Bernard, a Hamilton Reform rabbi and a freelance book columnist who writes for The Canadian Jewish News.

Watching a woman modelling a head at an exhibition, Baskin was transfixed by the sight. "It was a revelatory experience," he mused. "Once I saw that I didn't want to do anything else."

At around this juncture in his life, Baskin left the yeshivah he had been attending since the age of seven. His father, Rabbi Samuel Baskin, a Lithuanian Jew whom he describes as "a wonderful man," tried to dissuade him, fearing he would be unable to make a living. But Baskin could not be stopped. He left the cloistered confines of the yeshivah and was apprenticed to Maurice Glickman at the Educational Alliance in New York City.

Having abandoned the orthodoxy of the yeshivah, Baskin was drawn to Marxism. His father, though upset, did not disown him. "He was a great liberal, a Talmud chuchum."

Despite his rejection of organized religion, he is proud to call himself a Yiddishist. "I'm an atheist, but a Yiddishist through and through," said Baskin, who sprinkles his speech with Yiddish words and expressions. " I revel in Yiddish."

Baskin, who considers himself a socialist nowadays, is first and foremost a sculptor. However, he is also a formidable printmaker, having produced more than 1,000 prints in a fruitful career.

Recently, he started a series of prints and woodcuts on the Holocaust. "It took me 30 years to get to this subject," he said. "I had no meaningful way of depicting it.

Baskin, who has been influenced by the likes of Donatello, Michelangelo, Rembrandt and Goya, among others, has few interests outside the Gehenna Press, art and literature. "But art is life," he observed. "I guess you can say I'm wrapped up in art, overwhelmingly so."

Jewish life

Well worth reading... Ten or 15 years ago, Jews living in Germany supposedly "sat on their suitcases," waiting to leave. Today this is no longer the case. For better or worse, Jews have chosen to remain in Germany. In Speaking Out (edition q, $19.95 US), 20 prominent Jews who call Germany home offer an impressionistic view of the post-Holocaust community. The essays, edited by Susan Stern, are by turns thought-provoking and informative. A fine primer.

A complementary volume, Jewish Voices, German Words (Catbird Press, $23.95 US), is a probing collection of stories, essays and poems about the problems of Jewish life in contemporary Germany and Austria.

Jewish Identities in the New Europe (Littman Library of Jewish Civilization, $27.50), edited by Jonathan Webber, consists of cogent essays by some of the most learned observers of the current scene.

Last year, Montreal hosted a human rights conference to mark the 50th anniversary of the Nuremberg war crimes trials. Nuremberg Forty Years Later (McGill-Queen's University Press, $19.95) conveys a good sense of the proceedings through a series of essays edited by McGill University law professor Irwin Cotler.

Persecution, Extermination and Literature (University of Toronto Press, $17.95) is a rigorously scholarly examination of a multi-faceted topic that should be of interest to some readers. The author, Sem Dresden, is certainly knowledgeable, but regrettably, his work is extraordinarily ponderous and, therefore, inaccessible to the majority of readers.

For a change of pace, snuggle up with Swing, Swing, Swing (Penguin, $18.99), Ross Firestone's comprehensive biography of the inimitable musician Benny Goodman.

I am a faithful reader of the Jewish Chronicle, the weekly voice of British Jewry and one of the best Anglo-Jewish newspapers in existence. The Jewish Chronicle and Anglo-Jewry 1841-1991 (Cambridge University Press, $59.95 US) by David Cesarani is a serious analysis of the paper's development, its personalities, its power struggles and its impact on a community.

The Oxford History of World Cinema (Oxford University Press, $73.95), edited by Geoffrey Nowell-Smith, is the epitome of erudition. Chapters dealing with Yiddish film, Arab movies and films of the Nazi era will be of special interest to readers.

The Truth. And other lies.

What is truth? Who speaks it? Who knows it?

The answer depends on your point of view.

Ancient truth had the sun revolving around the earth. Most of us now reject that truth. Yet NASA sometimes takes just that point of view to make calculations on which astronauts' lives depend.

Western medicine, often called modern medicine, has followed a different line of truth than the medicine of other cultures.

Acupuncture and herbal remedies are examples of the many healing truths, each with its own validity, its own point of view.

The truth is, truth isn't.

A Question of Truth, a provocative new exhibition at the Ontario Science Centre, examines truth as points of view and explores how bias and prejudice have shaped scientific conclusions throughout history.

Once you've visited this challenging, confrontational exhibition, you'll see truth in a whole new light.

You'll recognize the built-in bias, ours in posing the questions and yours in reacting to them.

A Question of Truth. Open to interpretation daily at the Ontario Science Centre.

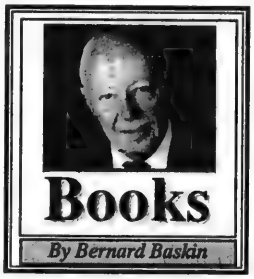
A new year for exciting books



Facing a new year, we are confronted with an astonishing phenomenon. More books on Jewish subjects are being published today than ever before in history. The shelves of bookstores — Jewish and general — are packed with exciting titles. The eager reader can now choose from a spate of volumes on every conceivable subject: Bible, Talmud, history, the Holocaust, contemporary Israel, theology, religious life, customs and ceremonies, cooking, mysticism, Hebrew and Yiddish literature and the novel in English.

Mainstream publishers, once reluctant to publish books for what seemed a small and even diminishing market, are now competing with each other to produce books on a wide variety of Jewish topics. In addition, there are now hundreds of formal programs of Jewish studies in universities and institutes of higher learning, Thousands of students are involved in Jewish scholarship — some of them intensively. What we are witnessing is the popularization of Jewish culture that includes for the first time a sizeable group of knowledgeable women. Jewish scholarship is no longer the legacy of the privileged few.

Blu Greenberg, former president of the Jewish Book Council, described this renaissance of the Jewish book as having many faces: "A doctor, whose book on Kabbalah rests beside the lounge chair in his elegant office, frayed bookmark one-third of the way through; a home-maker sitting on her front steps waiting for a carpool dropoff, reading a book on Jewish medical ethics. A promising young artist, immersed in a sociological review of Jewish life in America; a Fortune 500 president, taking a year's leave from the multimillion-dollar toy company to study about medieval Spanish Jewry; and my sister, director of social services of a large metropolitan hospital, preparing extensively for her monthly Jewish book club meeting."

This may be a somewhat rosy and overdrawn depiction, but it is in the general direction of truth. Why is all this happening now? Perhaps the answer lies in the ubiquitous paperback, the new celebration of ethnicity, the expansion of leisure time, as well as the quest for spiritual meaning in our complex and increasingly impersonal society. Moreover, there is the ever expanding Holocaust consciousness and heightened awareness of the importance of Israel. These have had a powerful impact on the self identity of many Jews — secular, marginal and religious.

This flowering of Jewish books occurs, paradoxically, when the demise of the book is being widely predicted. Sophisticated technology — such as the CD-ROM, the Web site and assorted hardware — now provides miracles. For example, the Hebrew scriptures and the entire Babylonian Talmud are now available on one disc.

Futurists argue that the human intellect is more closely in tune with the visual than the textual. Yet, the experts on the subject are divided. The introduction of TV didn't render radio obsolete, the typewriter did not eliminate the pencil and the car did not mean the end of the bicycle. Evidently, predictions about the last days of the book are simplistic and premature.

For the book reviewer the unprecedented torrent of Jewish books presents real problems. How are they to be sorted out? Which ones should be discussed? With so many worthwhile books available, it is inevitable that many will be overlooked, ignored or shunted aside. Moreover, the space allotted for book criticism in Jewish magazines and journals is limited and woefully inadequate.

The reviewer sighs with Koheleth, "Of the making of books there is no end." But he takes heart from the assurance of an old Jewish legend that every good book counts, for "whenever the shelves of the Library of Heaven are entirely full, and a new worthy book appears, all the books in the celestial collection press themselves closer together and make room."

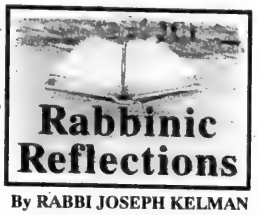
Jewish Life



A time of miracles

By RABBI JOSEPH KELMAN

Although we have a few years to go, there are already many ongoing discussions about the achievements of the 20th century, especially the second half. Truly it has been a period of tremendous dramatic changes in our lifestyle. Just think of the extraordinary changes and improvements in transportation, communication and other forms of technology. From the Jewish point of view, these last 50 years have been the most significant ones of the last 2,000 years. While many people associate miracles only with biblical times and events, there have been more miracles in the last 50 years than throughout Jewish history.

The first example is the establishment in 1948 of the State of Israel, which has become a powerful, democratic state, even though it is surrounded by hostile enemies. The Six Day War in 1967 saw many miracles culminating in the age-old dream of returning to Zion and the reunification of Jerusalem.

Two unbelievable happenings have taken place in and out of what was formerly known as the U.S.S.R. One was the collapse of communism there, which resulted in a resurgence of Judaism. Today there are hundreds of Hebrew schools flourishing and many synagogues operating freely. This was not conceivable even 10 years ago.

The second miracle was the absorption of over 500,000 Russian Jews into the fabric of Israeli life. This has given the Russian immigrants a new meaning in life and helped make Israel economically strong. In North America, as well as in other Jewish communities throughout the world, another extraordinary change has taken place. Thousands of young people and their families have discovered or rediscovered their need to be committed to the Jewish way of life. This has led to study and observance.

While the baal tshuvah, a person returning to Torah and mitzvot has been part of our history, there have never been so many at one time who have seen fit to change their whole lifestyle.

For many baalei tshuvah, the return began with the Shabbat experience.

There is no question that the observance of Shabbat for all Jews, not only the baal tshuvah, must remain a key element in the perpetuation of Judaism.

There are many people in Toronto, especially singles, who would welcome an invitation to celebrate Shabbat with a family. When was the last time you had a guest in your home who was not a family member? Think of it as a mitzvah in itself and an opportunity to inspire your guest to a greater understanding and appreciation of Shabbat. Far too many people see it as a day of restriction rather than a day of pleasure.

Having a non-observant guest in a good Jewish home Friday night or Shabbat can open the door for his or her greater commitment to Judaism. I am sure many of you can tell stories, as I can, about what happened in my own home and my parents' home when a visitor would see the true meaning of a Friday night Shabbat experience.

While Jewish continuity may not be called a miracle, let us hope that Shabbat will be celebrated properly in our own and other communities to help ensure a strong Jewish future in our own democratic country.

Birthday party in the fridge

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

There's a birthday being celebrated in your home next week. Actually the party is taking place in your refrigerator because next Wednesday evening is Tu b'Shvat, the traditional Jewish New Year for fruit.

Not one of the major holidays on the calendar, Tu b'Shvat has always has a special significance for school kids, the pioneers of Israel and more recently, for members of the environmental movement. And perhaps because of a lack of formal liturgy associated with the day, many people have crafted new observances to commemorate it. You can find that entire range of celebrations of Tu b'Shvat on the Jewish Highway.

According to Studies in Jewish Tradition [http://www.jajz-ed.org.il/rtub01.html] Tu b'Shvat is not mentioned in the Torah but is one of the first issues addressed in the Mishnah. The 15th of the month of Shvat was established as the New Year for purposes of tithing fruit. But according to this site, the holiday has evolved to include many observances including the Jewish people's link to the greening of the Land of Israel [http://www.jajz-ed.org.il/rtub02.html].

For several thought-provoking articles, go to Holidays with a Twist [http://www.wzo.org.il/encountr/holidays.htm#tub'shvat]. The Jewish Communications Network has also created a comprehensive site at [http://www.jcn18.com/holiday/tu_bshvt/index.html]. There you'll find links to pages that explain the history of the holiday, an explanation of how the day got its name and even to a Java Jumble word-search game. (Your Internet browser must be able to handle Java in order to play.)

If you want to read up on Tu b'Shvat and brush up on your Hebrew at the same time, go to the Milah Tu B'Shvat Newsletter [http://www.jer1.co.il/edu/milah/news.htm]. You do not need to have Hebrew fonts loaded onto your computer in order to read this page.

Unlike that other holiday with the famous seder, Tu b'Shvat has its own lesser-known seder. This seder centres on the sampling of various fruits and the drinking of four cups of wine [http://www.wzo.org.il/encountr/seder.htm].

But there is also a spiritual and kabbalistic significance to the ceremony which has inspired people to create their own variations of the seder. Take a look at Geri Garfinkel's [http://math.bu.edu/people/samuel/tubish-95.html], San Francisco's Congregation Sha'ar Zahav's [http://www.jcn18.com/holidaytu_bshvt/hagfull.htm] and Ari Davidow's Tu B'Shvat Seder Toolkit [http://www.ivritype.com/toolkits/tubtk11.pdf]. (Note: this file is in Adobe Acrobat format. In order to view it, you will need to download a free copy of Acrobat Reader [http://www.adobe.com/supportservice/custsupport/tsfilelib.html].)

The Coalition on the Environment and Jewish Life [http://www.jcn18.com/holiday/tu_bshvt/alert1.htm] suggests that Tu b'Shvat is the appropriate time for Jews to take action over the destruction of old growth trees in North America. For more on the coalition, see [http://www.jtsa.edu/org/coejl/source/invite.htm].

The Lights in Action's Environment page [http://www.lia.org/enviro.html] also draws a parallel between this holiday and environmental awareness.

But above all Tu b'Shvat remains a day to savour various common and exotic varieties of fruit. Sure, you can eat them raw [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/holidays/tu-bshvat/big.htm]. But why not really celebrate the holiday by creating your very own authentic Jewish fruitcake? [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/holidays/tu-bshvat/frutcake.htm]

Jewish Life

Many children alienated from Judaism today

In this issue we introduce a monthly column by Dr. Elliott Malamet, which will explore aspects of Jewish education. Malamet is a teacher at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and he leads a Shabbat morning service at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue called Pray and Learn.

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

What do the most important ideas and stories of Judaism really mean to Jewish teenagers, especially to those that are predominantly non-observant?

I was offered an intriguing answer to this question not long ago by a Grade 10 class with whom I was discussing the story of Akedat Yitzhak, where Abraham is called upon by God to sacrifice his beloved son. What kind of God would make such an irrational command? I prodded them. Yet I noticed that the students didn't seem terribly bothered by that question.

So in the midst of the class, I suddenly asked: "How many people here believe in God?" Twenty-five out of a possible 25 hands shot up. Good numbers, but numbers often lie. So I asked one girl what she would do if she heard the other kids badmouthing her best friend. Would she come to the defence of her friend in front of others? Absolutely, she replied. So your belief in your friend would lead you to act, and in a decisive and immediate way? She nodded. Your belief in your friend has an important daily impact on you? She nodded.

I asked again how many people here believe in God in that kind of way? Three out of 25 now raised their hands.

"O brave new world," exclaims Miranda at the end of The Tempest, only to receive her father Prospero's reminder, " Tis new to thee." The loss of those 22 hands is for me the symbol of a Judaism that has gone dead for many of our children and has led me to consider the "brave new world" that now confronts Jewish communities everywhere, the onslaught of modernity and the loss of meaning in our religious lives and those of our kids.

In discussing the story, the kids said things like, "Well, Abraham was a great man so God could tell him to do stuff like that and he'd listen." But underneath the ostensible piety and religious correctness of such a response, I suspected a real disengagement. So I pushed it. What if God spoke in your ear and told you to shoot your child?

Slowly, the truth came tumbling out. They thought the story was, to be honest, crazy. Then why do we learn it? Well, it's a piece of our history, one boy said enthusiastically. One student added that maybe that was the kind of thing they did a long time ago, but not now. He was correct, of course, but what he meant was that it has nothing to do with me now. Abraham, they were telling me, is a piece of history, a great man but not one to imitate, "if you want my honest opinion."

Students have learned the right things to mouth about the patriarchs and matriarchs, but they often remain distanced from the actual spiritual ramifications of the story. What ramifications? How to work through conflicts between authority and your own conscience, for one thing, and how and why to remain committed to something that, at times, seems to make unreasonable demands of you. Commitments like Judaism, for example.

In the coming months, this column will bring to the fore issues regarding Jewish education today. Why are substantial numbers of our children alienated from Judaism? What can parents and educators do about this, both in theory and in practice? What should be our vision in speaking to the next generation about God and Torah, about the fundamental questions of a well-examined life? I welcome your questions, your comments, your complaints and your suggestions.

Sephardic Educational Centre forms chapter in Toronto area

NORTH YORK — The Sephardic Educational Centre (SEC) – a centre for all Jews – has formed a chapter in the Metro Toronto area.

The SEC is an international movement dedicated to youth and young adults. Founded in 1980 by Dr. Jose Nessim of Beverly Hills, Calif., a Sephardi Jew from Paraguay, the SEC has a campus in the Old City of Jerusalem and chapters around the world.

The SEC holds an annual international Young Adult Convention. This year, Sépharad '96, the eighth annual convention, was held from Aug. 30 to Sept. 2 in Los Angeles. The weekend included Shabbat services, discussions on the perpetuation of Sephardi traditions in the lives of young adults and leadership workshops.

In Toronto, all Jewish young adults, Sephardi or not, between the ages of 19 and 35 are invited to join. They will have the opportunity to plan and participate in fun and interesting programs and to meet people from around the world.

A group of eight young adults and the newly appointed young adult director of the SEC, Yael Azuelos, have met to create a Toronto chapter. For more information, call Azuelos at the office 416-398-4134.

"Just Between Us"

Labor Zionist leader turns 90

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

Israel Appel

TORONTO —A large turnout of family and friends honored Israel Appel, a prominent Labor Zionist and supporter of Israel, on his 90th birthday at a luncheon at the Borochov Centre.

A member of the Fur Workers Union who fought for workers' rights, Appel helped to form the Independent Friendly Workers Circle and became chair of the Zerubavel branch. Later he was instrumental in making sure that newcomers to Canada also formed independent branches.

Currently Appel is still the chair of the Council of the Amielwitch-Zerubavel-Federman branches.

Born Feb. 15, 1907, in Ostrovitz, Poland, Appel went to live in Brazil at the age of 17. After two years in Brazil, he moved to Paris, where he learned the fur trade while waiting for his visa to come to Canada to join his parents, which he did in November 1926.

He joined the Poale Zion youth movement, where he met Rose, whom he married in 1928.

Together with other young families, he helped to found the Borochov School. He served on the board of the Bialik Hebrew Day School for many years.

Appel was also involved with the Achdut Avoda Poale Zion and the Histadrut and was totally committed to the founding and building of Israel.

The Appel home was always open and hosted many Yiddish cultural gatherings, where Yiddish writers and Labor Zionist figures from Israel and New York were often seen.

In 1946, when his brother Charles returned to Canada at the end of World War II, they went into the fur business together as the House of Appel which was in existence until 1986.

Appel's son, David, and daughter-in-law, Ruth, live in Israel and they have two sons in the Israeli army.

His daughter, Bayla, prominent in Yiddish circles, is married to Dr. Leo Chaikoff and lives in Toronto. They have three children. Eli, married to Melissa, is a vascular surgeon in Atlanta. David and his wife, Ellen, are lawyers, as are daughter Sari and her husband, Hal Springer.

PRESENTED IN CO-OPERATION WITH THE CONSULATE GENERAL OF ISRAEL, TORONTO

Craftsman employs old-time techniques to restore furniture

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — If you're looking for a French inlaid table, crafted with the same techniques used more than a century ago, Bill Vasile Israel can make one for you.

In his workshop on Wingold Avenue, which he opened last year, Israel recently took one month to complete a copy of a solid wood 1754 Queen Anne table and says it would be difficult for an untrained eye to tell it from an original.

Born in Romania, Israel studied furniture and cabinet making and went on to master marquetry in wood, brass, silver and wood carving. In 1966, he graduated in visual art while working for a furniture refinisher who used the French polish technique.

In 1977, he moved to Paris where he worked on fine French furniture, statues and antique pieces. He arrived in Canada in 1982 and worked for Yolles Antique furniture.

He now specializes in dove tail (no nails) reproduction pieces and prefers the French hand polish finish.

Recently, Israel created a hand-carved king-size head and footboard from two single beds and repaired a marble table. The design is an exact match, he says and defies anyone to find where it was broken.

Europeans appreciate workmanship found in antiques

European furniture, particularly French, is the finest in the world, he says, and attributes this to the many technical schools and the apprentice system in Europe.

"Almost everyone in Europe buys old or antique furniture.They appreciate the workmanship." He adds that there is a growing number of people in Canada who appreciate good workmanship.

Israel says he hopes to import pieces from Europe and open a school to teach the art of building and repairing fine furniture.

CELEBRATING RAMAH

Camp Ramah in Canada officially dedicated the new name of its Utterson, Ontario campsite last month as the Max and Beatrice Wolfe campus. Over 200 people came to Beth Tzedec Congregation to celebrate Camp Ramah, now in its 38th year of operation, with the families of Phyllis Flatt and Harold Wolfe, including rabbis and educators active in supporting the camp. The gift will be used to build a major indoor centre for drama and recreation, as well as to provide scholarship assistance each summer for many campers. A third part of this gift will create the Ramah Family Institute whose goal is to bring together families from throughout the Toronto area for Ramah-style programming year-round. Seen at the dedication (from left) Rabbi Sheldon Dorph, director, National Ramah Commission; Rabbi Mitchell Cohen, director, Camp Ramah in Canada; Ab Flatt, Phyllis Flatt, Harold Wolfe, Carole Wolfe, Rabbi Ismar Schorsch, chancellor, Jewish Theological Seminary; Alan Silberman, president, National Ramah Commission. The summer dedication of the campsite will take place at the camp on July 20.

Victoria blizzard damages shul sanctuary, roof

By MAURICE LUCOW
Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — The recent blizzard that dumped more than five feet of snow on Victoria damaged the roof of Congregation Emanu-El so badly that it will have to be replaced, according to synagogue officials.

Water leakage from the roof also caused damage in the sanctuary, but none of the Torahs or other sacred items were affected.

The total cost of repairs is estimated at about $10,000.

Despite the damage and inconvenience, services are continuing.

Some of the damage caused to buildings throughout the area will be repaired at federal government expense, but who gets what is still being determined, says the MP for Victoria, David Anderson The synagogue, the oldest in Canada, has been in continuous use since it was built in 1863.

Order of Canada appointments

OTTAWA — Several Jewish Canadians were the recipients last week of the Order of Canada, announced by Governor General Romeo LeBlanc.

Appointed as officers, the order's second highest rank, were the late philanthropist Peter Bronfman of Montreal; Toronto historian Jack Granatstein and comedian Frank Shuster of Toronto.

Appointed members were Thomas Beck of Toronto for volunteerism; arts patron Jenny Belzberg of Calgary; journalist and former MP Simma Holt of Coquitlam, B.C.; Richard Margolese of Montreal for health care; Montreal educator Sarah Paltiel; Bernard Snell of Edmonton for health care; actor Al Waxman of Toronto; and Irving Zucker, a Hamilton philanthropist.

Ottawa JCC executive director leaves position

Urman told The CJN he stepped down "for personal and professional reasons" and that he's exploring a number of options. His resignation took effect Dec. 20.

Urman took over the council from Gerry Koffman about 2½ years ago, and successfully oversaw the community's largest fundraising campaign to build a community and education centre.

THE HEARTBEAT OF BAYCREST

The people of Baycrest.
The clients, the community, the staff and the volunteers, make up the heart of Baycrest.

Going beyond the expected and adding quality to life is a part of the tradition and history at Baycrest.

Joy Richards
came from Montreal just over two years ago, to become head nurse on floors 3 and 4 of the Jewish Home for the Aged. Since joining Baycrest, she has been working towards the "attending nurse philosophy" on her units, at all levels of care. And with her beaming smile and gentleness of spirit, encourages the process.

"The residents on our two floors are all cognitively impaired and greatly respond to a loving touch or smile. And because they have the same caregiver all the time, a warm and caring friendship develops. Some of our residents have lost the ability to speak, but that doesn't mean they aren't understood, because a friend will understand you, however you communicate."

Nursing leadership at Baycrest is a partnership process at all levels. Attention and respect to the resident and each other; adding quality to life for everyone.

Baycrest, our future is the community.

Zodiac Swim School goes to camp!!

While Zodiac's swim programs are popular year-round, Zodiac's spring programs (mid-March to mid-June) attract many "rookies" launching their swim careers and "veterans" looking to sharpen their skills for the cottage, camp or other fun summer activities!

During Zodiac's 18 years of operation, while skill development at all levels of Red Cross, Life Saving and other specialized courses has been a central focus, building each student's self-esteem, confidence and trust has been equally important. Qualified and caring instructors and supervisors, together with Directors Ellen and Rick Howard, work closely with students and parents in effectively achieving these goals.

Zodiac is also very excited about working together again with Green Acres Day Camp for the Summer of '97 in bringing Zodiac Swim School calibre swim lessons to Green Acres' campers! Many parents recognize the tremendous advantage of having Zodiac meet their children's individual swimming needs on a year round basis, both at Zodiac Swim School and at Green Acres.

For those who want to supplement the camp or other summer experience or simply want their children to benefit from having the opportunity to continue Zodiac's swim lessons during the summer, Zodiac also operates its own popular summer program and "backyard" swimming lessons!

Israel Summer Programs 1997 - summer has never been so much fun!

The Canada Israel Experience Centre offers a wide variety of Israel Experience Programs for teenagers and university students. This summer give your teenager the gift that lasts a lifetime — a summer in Israel. They will have the opportunity to explore Israel, experience Israeli culture and meet people of their own age from all across Canada and around the world. The following are some of the programs that are designed for 16 and 17 year olds.

Israel Dimensions is an extensive touring program. For 40 days our expert staff will lead you through the diverse beauty that is Israel. Explore the spiritual side of Judaism in Jerusalem. Taste the life of an Israeli soldier during a 3-day army program. Experience the country's natural beauty on a 3-day outdoor sea-to-sea adventure in the north. Work as a member of a kibbutz for a week. See the sunrise from atop Massada. Sleep under the stars in a Bedouin tent. Relax in a waterfall in a desert oasis. Haggle in an open-air market in downtown Tel Aviv. Welcome the Sabbath at the Western Wall.

Israel Encounter is an opportunity for those teenagers who, in addition to touring Israel, wish to contribute something valuable to Israel and want to make a difference. You will travel off the beaten path with an itinerary specifically designed to encompass experiences not available to tourist groups. You will have the opportunity to form lifelong friendships with Israeli BBYO teens during a week of fun, introspection and a joint learning experience. Additionally, you will help preserve the land of Israel through a meaningful and exciting hands-on environmental activity and share in the rewards of participating in volunteer assignments in Israeli Communities.

Biluim Israel is the culmination of the Young Judaea camping experience. Graduates of the Biluim Canada program move on to Biluim Israel for an unforgettable Israel Experience. Biluim Israel is an intensive program designed to cover all of Israel by including extensive touring, Special Activities Week, Gadna, Kibbutz or a sea-to-sea hike, leadership seminars and a special Jerusalem component. Biluim Israel is open to non-members of Young Judaea.

The Canada Israel Experience Centre is also your resource centre on all types of Israel Experiences long and short term programs. Crestwood Valley "Mid-town Jewel"

Crestwood Valley Day Camp, located in a beautiful wooded valley at Bayview and Lawrence Avenues, brings children ages 2 1/2—10 close to nature while providing them with the comforts of home.

Campers are encouraged to explore the valley in which the camp is located. Campers are also introduced to nature through experience on the camp's own miniature farm, which features a vegetable garden and many animals including pigs, ducks, chickens and rabbits. "Our campers enjoy visiting the farm," says Wise. "It is exciting for the younger campers for whom the animals become such special friends."

The camp experience at Crestwood includes supervised arts and crafts (featuring a full pottery program), drama, dance, performance art, puppetry and a dynamic athletic program. Pre-schoolers are offered a full sports program including T-Ball, soccer and co-operative games, helping them develop hand-eye co-ordination and motor skills. An exciting archery program is always a favourite of the children.

"Crestwood has a professional swim program. We overhire qualified swim staff," Wise says, "because we want to ensure that our campers have the best swim instructors available, with small instructor-camper ratios." Crestwood has 5 heated swimming pools on site.

Crestwood's Baseball Training Camp encourages campers who have completed Grade 1 and up to take part in an intensive program focusing on the development of skills and confidence, coached by experienced instructors. Campers in this program enjoy baseball in the mornings and join the rest of the camp for regular activities for the afternoon.

New for '97 - the basketball clinic for campers ages 7—10 promises fun, action and excitement.

Campers are encouraged to participate in an in-camp overnight which features a cook-out and a traditional campfire and sing-a-long.

Crestwood also introduces its campers to the joys of camping out. Campers completing Grade 2 and up have the option of participating in a 4-day trip to an overnight camp.

Campers never long for the conveniences of home while they experience the great outdoors. They are provided with convenient door-to-door transportation and are served full catered nutritional lunches. Crestwood's air-conditioned rooms and gymnasium are available for inclement weather.

Wise adds that campers revel in "the cozy, family atmosphere" of Crestwood. "Our (180) staff members are very close, and very spirited, building lasting memories for our children."

Swimming is a total fitness exercise for the whole body, using every muscle including the heart. Swimming improves strength and motor co-ordination in children and adults; and it is an ideal exercise for many people with physical challenges, because buoyancy in water eliminates the strain of weight.

Swimming is also part of fun at camp; and all water sports are more fun for a kid who is fit, safe, and comfortable in the water. At Shendy's Swim School, there is an emphasis on both fitness and safety. Eric Shendelman and his staff have helped many students develop their swimming skills, including children and adults with long-standing phobias.

Shendelman, who teaches for the York Region Board of Education, has been actively teaching swimming for 14 years and has been involved in the camping field for over 20 years. He will be bringing this experience to his new position as director of Camp Arrowhead this coming summer.

Shendy's instructors keep a 1:3 ratio to students. The teachers are well trained and utilize creative methods to keep the classes fun and students motivated. The staff are always approachable and keep parents up to date on their child's progress throughout each session.

Shendy's offers a wide range of Red Cross and Life Saving programs for all ages. The new Red Cross Aquaquest program was a great success in the fall session. Many students had their first experience learning the butterfly stroke, which helped to improve their strength and co-ordination.

Once again, Shendy's Swim School, as a commercial member of the Ontario Camping Association, will be offering various leadership and recertification courses throughout the winter and spring sessions. Many camp staff from all over Ontario have accessed these programs to update their skills and qualifications.

Centre Camp for fun to remember

Director Karen Nusbaum describes Centre Camp at the Bathurst Jewish Centre as "a lot of choice in just one place." The outdoor grounds encompass 5 acres, and the indoor facility comprises 250,000 sq. ft. There is something here for every kid!

Now in her 9th year as Camp Director, Karen has been with the Centre 10 years; she also directs Community and Family Services. "I became a camper at 3," she says; "and camps have been my life ever since."

In Karen's words, Centre Camp offers every child "a fun and memorable summer." Every child's unique skills and interests are nurtured; and kids with special needs participate fully.

There are half-day programs for kids 2 1/2—4, full-day for kids 4—15, and specialized computer, sports or arts programs for senior campers 8—12. Centre Camp's major component, the all-round program, offers crafts, drama, dance, sports, Judaica, music and nature study.

The break camps are all-round programs: Winterlude for winter break, Gimme a Break in March, and Passover camp. Jewish culture is integrated into all programs and special events.

Full-day campers have two swims daily, one instructional and one recreational. Juniors get to play in the indoor Fun Centre; and seniors have the option of overnight camp. To meet the needs of every family, full-day summer camps offer free transportation, and extended day service if required.

Every child receives personal attention. For pre-schoolers, there is 1 counsellor to 4 children; 4 and 5 year-olds, 1:5; 6 and 7 year-olds, 1:6 and for children 8 and over, 1:7. Also, kids 13—15 work with counsellors, training as Leadership Campers; and there is a Counsellor-In-Training program for campers that have completed Grade 9.

Staff are chosen both for their rapport with kids, and for their professionalism. A registered nurse is always on duty; all staff are First Aid trained; and senior staff are CPR-certified. Centre Camp is accredited with the Ontario Camping Association.

"Shop around," Karen smiles, "and you'll come to Centre Camp." It's minutes away from your front door, at 4588 Bathurst, on the west side north of Sheppard. Call (416) 636-1880, ext. 378.

BEFORE AND AFTER

by Amy Auster, Italy Leadership Training Program

So I'm the stereo-typical Jewish girl from Long Island who decided to spend 5 weeks of her summer in Israel.

It's June 30, 12:30 a.m. and I'm sitting in my diner, sharing a plate of fries with one of my best friends. We're talking about all the gossip in my town and about the summer experience I'm about to have. I tell her that I think I'll change, because everyone who goes to Israel says it's a summer of a lifetime. She then convinces me I won't - that it's all psychological. So, basically I think, I'm leaving for Rome in 12 hours and I'm really confused! (Besides the fact that my luggage is too big for me to carry!)

A week into the trip, I find myself writing that same friend a letter, telling her she was wrong. The week I spent in Rome and on the boat was amazing. I then go on to explain to her how much I'm learning and all the great friends I'm making, in an attempt to make her understand how lucky I am and how I wish she could be here experiencing these things too.

I always knew that I'd spend a summer in Israel and it would be fun, but it is so much more than that. I also feel like I'm growing and even though I'll still go home a Long Island girl, I'll be a more mature, educated Jewish girl, who has a greater understanding of her history.

Camp Ramah inspires today's youth

Camp Ramah, on Skeleton Lake offers a quality camping program in the framework of traditional Jewish practice. Our safe and comprehensive waterfront program staffed by certified instructors is a highlight for our camper's. Sports is an integral part of every camper's development, focusing on skills, teamwork, and sportsmanship. Arts activities allow each camper to realize their creative potential through projects, performances, and individualized instruction. Outdoors programs take full advantage of the camp's beautiful setting while raising our camper's environmental awareness. Judaica, Hebrew, and Israel programming are a regular part of the camp day. Jewish texts are taught by young adults in an informal setting. Hebrew is spoken, heard and often becomes second nature at camp. Shabbat, prayer and ritual observance assume special qualities when experienced and shared with friends.

Ramah continues to offer a unique one month program for campers with special needs. The Tikvah ("Hope") program gives adolescents ages 12 and older an opportunity to enjoy every aspect of camp while defining their own Jewish identity.

Staff is often former campers who return to Ramah because of the deep-rooted commitment to the Ramah environment. Young people develop skills and leadership, enduring friendships and a Jewish consciousness that help them become vibrant members of their family and home community.

Summertime news for your wintertime blues

Situated in the scenic Kawartha Lakes region of central Ontario, Camp Moshava provides a full range of sports activities, swimming, canoeing, hiking, nature study, arts & crafts, drama, shira, and special programs and events.

To achieve our goal of fostering a commitment to the Bnei Akiva principles of love of G-d, love of Torah and love of Israel, we assemble and train a staff of exceptional young men and women to work with our campers in a warm, supportive, Orthodox Zionist environment.

What makes Camp Moshava unique goes far beyond facilities, events and personalities. The ruach or atmosphere that exists amongst our staff and campers is truly special. Dancing and singing on Shabbat are experiences not to be missed! This along with our full range of daily activities contribute to a living experience in Torah V'Avodah. Camp Moshava's ability to incorporate experiential learning into all aspects of our program clearly sets us apart.

Call our office at (416) 630-7578 to find out what Camp Moshava has to offer you.

Israel camp for girls fosters individual growth

Overnight camps have long been recognized as an excellent supplement to a year-round Torah education. Camping fosters varied opportunities for individual growth. Group living, independence, formal as well as informal learning, song, dance, drama, swimming, etc. are just some of the benefits offered in this natural surrounding

But ... a new dimension has been added at N'Vei Ashdod. For the past 13 years N'Vei Ashdod has provided all these things, and more ... in Eretz Yisrael where everything takes on a special flavour.

Lively, frum girls from all over the world come to Camp N'Vei Ashdod and forge lifelong friendships. It is indeed rare to find so many girls from so many places, blending so naturally. Perhaps it is the love for Eretz Yisrael which brings them so close together.

Situated in beautiful central Israel, in a tranquil, fully enclosed, modern campus with an enormous pool and beautiful grounds, N'Vei Ashdod combines learning, sports, fun and excitement with extensive touring throughout Israel.

The girls travel across the country in air-conditioned buses with the finest tour guides available. The whole time, security is top priority.

Shabbos, whether in camp or outside, is particularly special; picture Shabbos in the old city of Jerusalem, or in the Ir HaKodesh of Tzfat, guest lectures, Talmidei Chachomim, authors and well known Torah personalities add an extra dimension to the Israel experience.

N'Vei Ashdod, the touring camp for girls ages 10-17 in Israel is now in its 13th summer.

Camp Kadimah — an unforgettable summer experience

Camp Kadimah is located in rural Nova Scotia and offers a unique, dynamic and distinctly Jewish summer experience for all who attend. Once a camp that catered to the Maritime provinces, Camp Kadimah has evolved into an international camp, one that draws campers and staff from all across Canada, the United States and beyond. Camp Kadimah is one of the fastest growing Jewish summer camps in North America and there is no better time to join the Kadimah family than now.

Camp Kadimah is known by all who attend as a "second home", one which fosters friendships that last a lifetime. Not considered a large camp, Kadimah's 260 campers and 75 staff provide the ideal setting for a child to spend his/her summer.

Our 6 week camp offers a wide variety of traditional activities and programs, as well as many innovative special programs that are not duplicated at other camps. Our campers range from age 7—16 including a comprehensive C.I.T. program.

There is no shortage of summer camps, particularly in Central Canada, but Camp Kadimah is not just another summer camp. Camp Kadimah is a family, one that is continually growing and expanding each year. Most summer camps are exactly that — a summer experience. Camp Kadimah is an experience that lasts throughout the year, and indeed, for a lifetime.

A camper who attends Kadimah will leave knowing more than just how to sail or throw a baseball, he/she will depart having grown as a person. In addition to the traditional camp skills, Camp Kadimah encourages openness, understanding, co-operation, and many other qualities that will enable a camper to mature as an individual, while at the same time remaining an intricate part of Camp Kadimah's "chevra".

Even though Camp Kadimah is located in Nova Scotia, our fees (including airfare) are still comparable to those of our competitors. Camp Kadimah is a not for profit organization and is committed to just one goal — providing all who attend with a meaningful and fun filled summer.

For those of you who are looking for a special place to send your child for a summer experience they will not forget, Camp Kadimah is waiting to welcome you with open arms. There are still a few places left in our younger age sections and C.I.T. age program. Please contact our offices in Toronto (416) 780-9095, Montreal (514) 747-8485 or Halifax (902) 422-7491 to obtain 1997 camper applications.

Camp Gesher: Home away from home

Camp Gesher is situated on beautiful Pringle Lake in Ontario's Land O'Lakes region, approximately 100 kilometres north of Kingston. Gesher provides a unique camping experience where campers explore Jewish life and culture through a multitude of camping activities. Our camp offers a number of sporting and water activities as well as an intensive leadership training program for those campers who have completed Grade 9. It is an accredited member of both the Ontario and Canadian Camping Associations.

So what brings all the campers to Gesher? It is the unique atmosphere that we create year in and year out. Gesher creates that home-away-from-home. We manage to stay "small" even though we are getting bigger. Gesher is a place where the Ruach (spirit) is high and the friendships are everlasting. Our nighttime activities and special programs are designed to create close relationships and warm feelings between the different age groups. Our uniqueness is also created through our informal use of Ivrit (Hebrew), our special link to Israel and our unforgettable Oneg Shabbats!

Programs offered include: Certified swim and water-ski instruction, canoe trips, basketball, volleyball, floor hockey, baseball, soccer, tennis informal Judaica, Chugim (hobby groups), Tzofiut (scouting), and much, much more.

But the fun doesn't stop when camp is over. During the year activities for your children are held in all the major cities. Recently, we held our annual Fall Seminar Reunion. It was a resoundingly successful weekend.

Shabbat dinner was energetic as 80 campers and 30 counsellors from Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa, Hamilton, and other places were reunited with each other for the first time since camp ended. We also held our annual football game, which we ended up playing in the first snowfall of the season! The weekend was enjoyed by all, and everyone left with their environmentally friendly burlap bags which they constructed over the weekend.

Our next reunion seminar will be in February. Watch for details!

During the summer, a select staff of experienced counsellors are chosen to provide careful and individual supervision to each camper. All our counsellors, many of whom have grown up with Camp Gesher, have completed at least grade 12 with most being in University. In addition, our staff includes Shlichim (emissaries) from kibbutzim. They create a living link between the camp and Israel.

The attraction for your children to attend Gesher is that it offers them the opportunity of doing something different and a chance to meet new Jewish friends from Canada, Israel, the United States and Europe. For parents it is a way of affording a summer of fun for your children. So don't be disappointed – REGISTER NOW!

Professor chronicles history of Auschwitz

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

WATERLOO, ONT. — An off-the-cuff answer during the 1984 defence of his doctoral thesis marked the beginning of architect Robert Jan van Pelt's professional interest in the Holocaust.

Now a professor at the University of Waterloo's School of Architecture, van Pelt, 41, put in almost a decade of work on Auschwitz, 1270 to the present, the recently published book he co-authored with Debórah Dwork, professor of Holocaust History at Clark University in Worcester, Mass.

As a doctoral student at the University of Leiden in his native Holland, van Pelt had researched the Temple of Solomon (the First Temple). When an examiner asked him to name a contemporary building that would stimulate the same kind of speculation as the Temple, he replied, "Probably the crematoria at Auschwitz."

Unlike that spontaneous answer, the almost 400 pages of Auschwitz – dense with photos, architectural plans, charts, statistics and poignant personal stories – reflect exhaustive research by the two authors.

A 1990 grant from the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada enabled van Pelt to do extensive on-site research to try and place the concentration camp in a broader social and historical context.

Robert Jan van Pelt

A myriad of details in the book attest to the one-time ordinariness of Auschwitz and the non-genocide-related aspects of its wartime history. Ironically, the existence of such "apparent contradictions [not necessarily those in the book] allow Holocaust deniers to make the insane assertions that they do," van Pelt said.

"The SS leaders themselves did not anticipate in 1940 what they wrought in 1944," the book asserts. "Yet, step by step, blueprint by blueprint, the architects, at the behest of their bosses, came to plan and execute the horror we call Auschwitz..."

Despite the authors' contention that the Holocaust was not inevitable, survivors have indicated to them that reading the book allowed them to make sense of their experience.

Van Pelt and Dwork joined forces several years ago after pursuing independent research (Dwork's area being the Holocaust experience of Jewish children, the subject of her book Children with a Star.)

Both authors had themselves lost relatives in the Holocaust. Van Pelt, the son of a Jewish mother, considers Auschwitz "in some way my way of saying Kaddish" for an uncle who perished in the concentration camp and for whom he was named.

The experience of van Pelt's father, a non-Jewish physician, also motivated his research quest. Van Pelt senior, who attended medical school in Holland immediately after the war, studied the now-infamous Nazi medical experiments as part of a 1946 medical ethics course.

In architectural circles, however, van Pelt encountered an absence of analogous professional knowledge. "If doctors in 1946 were talking, why didn't anyone know who the [crematorium] architect was? Why wasn't this an issue?"

He attempted to make it an issue at the University of Virginia in Charlottesville, where he was an assistant professor from 1985 to 1987. His colleagues, however, "plotzed" at his suggestion that the Auschwitz crematoria be included on a list of important buildings with which architectural history students should be familiar.

While continuing to deal with the issue in his lectures and publications, including one chapter of a book he co-authored with a Virginia colleague, van Pelt was inspired by Dwork's intensive research among Holocaust survivors and decided to undertake his own "massive historical detailed empirical research." By focusing on the architectural aspect, he felt he had been sidestepping the broader issues of the camp itself.

His current projects include a four-month teaching stint at Clark University's new PhD program in Holocaust history to join Dwork in training the next generation of Holocaust historians.

Multiculturalism Week set

VANCOUVER — British Columbia's Multiculturalism Week, Feb. 16 to 22, will feature programs in work places, schools and community centres throughout the province.

In 1985, the first Multiculturalism Week was organized by the Affiliation of Multicultural and Social Service Agencies (AMSSA), with the assistance of the B.C. Teachers Federation. Canadian Jewish Congress Pacific region is a member of AMSSA.

By 1986, with the support of the Union of B.C. Municipalities, over 35 municipal and regional districts had joined the program.

Arab press

he continues to stay in touch with the Arab world by reading a number of their newspapers that are easily available at stores in the Arab community. He is particularly incensed with the anti-Jewish attacks he has noted in recent years. "I know they attack Israel and Zionism," he said, "but when they say 'Jews' or 'Jewish people,' I get upset about it."

An Oct. 9, 1996 article in the Al-Miraat (The Mirror) newspaper, which is printed in Arabic in Montreal, focused on the opening of the Jerusalem tunnel, adjacent to the Temple Mount. The opening prompted rioting in which dozens were killed and wounded.

The article was headed, "We respect your stones, you the people of Palestine," and said "you won't be safe near the Jews" and that "history has taught us that you cannot trust their side."

Sasson is also upset by a poem that ran in the May 15, 1996 issue of Al-Miraat, titled Rachel and Her Sisters. The poem refers to the retaliatory Israeli artillery attack on Palestinian rocket launchers in south Lebanon in which 91 civilians near the rocket launchers were killed.

The poem said "they entered Cana over our bodies and raising the Nazi flag in the southern land...Hitler burned them in the gas chamber and they came after him to burn us. Hitler exiled them from Eastern Europe and they from our land exiled us. Hitler couldn't find time to eliminate them and wrest the earth from them and they came after him to annihilate us...."

Sasson said he has written to Al-Miraat, but his letter has not been published. He has also taken his concerns to Canadian Jewish Congress. Bernie Farber, Congress' director of community relations, said the Al-Orouba article "is vitriolic anti-Semitism of the worst order." He said Congress was concerned about all three articles and that "we have a plan of action that will involve at the first level meetings with the editors. We will put forward in the strongest possible terms that what they're printing may be in violation of Canada's anti-hate laws."

The linkage of Jews and Nazis was a major theme of the Sabbagh article in Al-Orouba. Referring to the extradition of alleged war criminal Erich Priebke from Argentina to Italy, the article states he was "a German officer in a unit called the SS while he was fulfilling his military service in Italy..."

Noting Priebke was 83, the article suggests he was at the time on trial "under Jewish spitefulness." Why haven't human rights groups protested this, the article asks. "Isn't it proof that these organizations are falling under Jewish influence which controls and drives the media in these countries.

Saadi Al-Malih, editor and owner of Al-Miraat, said although the weekly paper may print articles criticizing Israel or Zionism, "we never run something anti-Jewish."

"I have a lot of Jewish friends and in my opinion, there is nothing different between Jews, Christians and Muslims," he said.

Al-Malih said the poem, Rachel and Her Sisters, was written by a world-renowned poet, Nazar Kabany, and originally ran in Al-Hiyat, an Arab newspaper in England. He said "there is nothing anti-Jewish in the poem," insisting it is anti-Israel.

Referred to the stanzas in which Hitler is cited, Al-Malih maintained the poem is saying "they're doing to us what Hitler did to them."

Despite repeated calls from The CJN to Al-Orouba, the paper's editor, Sobhi Kallil, was unavailable for comment.

Seeing ourselves in the plight of Aboriginal people

By STEPHEN STATE
Special to The CJN

The recent publication of the findings of the Canadian Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples has brought the Native Question, temporarily at least, to the forefront of Canadian public attention. How should Jews respond? Need there be a distinctive Jewish response at all?

Guest Voices

The situation of Aboriginal peoples in Canada and elsewhere is in important respects surprisingly similar to the situation of world Jewry. That similarity, if nothing else, is grounds for sympathy and support. Just as Jews in the context of Israel express a spiritual connection to Ha'Aretz so do Aboriginal Canadians express a spiritual connection to their land. Just as Jews struggle to maintain their identity, their language, their traditions in the face of a seductive and sometimes threatening otherness, so do Aboriginal Peoples seek to maintain and in some cases recover their traditions and languages.

The recent commemoration of Sepharad, "the golden age of Spanish Jewry," points out for us the significance of the year 1492. More than any other year it marks the utter destruction of what had been an extraordinary Jewish culture. From that point, to be a Jew in the Iberian peninsula was to die, to lie or to leave; Jews were burned at the stake, forced to practise in secret as Marranos, expelled from their homes.

The year 1492 has a similar resonance with North American Aboriginal peoples. It marks the beginning of a massive cultural displacement. The very concept of a New World, an entirely Eurocentric construct, conceals and negates the old, established world whose destruction fed this hemispheric innovation. From that point to the present Aboriginal peoples were killed, marginalized, oppressed and confined. Their languages were repressed, their religion demeaned, their children taken from them, their culture subjected to the regulatory yoke of foreign legal codes. Much of this, moreover, was done with the paternalistic enthusiasm of a misguided civilization intent.

Neither 20th century Jews nor, for that matter, 20th century Christians are responsible for what was enacted centuries before they were born. Some churches have indeed issued apologies for the actions of their predecessors (see for example, Long and Dickason, Visions of the Heart: Canadian Aboriginal Issues, Harcourt Brace, 1996, p. 27) but the locus of any plausible guilt must reside in the present. Guilt associated with documented crimes of child and sexual abuse in the context of residential schools where many Native children were sent is an obvious case. A particular case that raises serious questions about racism in Canadian society is the murder of Helen Betty Osborne. Not only was she brutally raped and murdered because of her native origin but a widespread conspiracy of silence has to this day obstructed the pursuit of justice in apprehending the perpetrators. But in what sense can Canadians in general or Jews in particular be held responsible?

The question answers itself insofar as it gives rise to the hasty retort: "We didn't know what was going on." We cannot as Jews make use of that response for reasons which do not need to be elaborated. The fact is that Canadian public policy has ghettoized native reservations; not in the sense of creating a separate space for Aboriginal peoples to live. A separate culture and a separate space is what many First Nations have said that they want. Reservations are ghettos in the sense of being impoverished and often lethal places in which to live. They are expressions of systemic racism.

By reference to virtually every measure of human welfare — sanitation, sewage treatment, potable water, education, nutrition, health and mortality — the situation of Aboriginal Canadians on reservations is qualitatively inferior to the general population.

The cause of this comparative misery will not likely be found at the level of intentions; it will be found at the level of public policy — the unintended consequences of how the system works. The system does not work very well for Aboriginal Canadians despite our Constitutional commitment to provide "essential public services of reasonable quality to all Canadians".

The sin for which guilt is appropriate here, is the sin of omission. Public policy in a democracy is modified when those in power sense a widespread and vocal concern. Minorities by themselves are typically unable to muster the requisite numbers and it is up to others to speak up in support of justice. All Canadians have that civic obligation; Jews have as well a religious obligation to pursue justice.

The other obvious Judaic hook arises from our self-understanding as a covenant people. We are enjoined to keep our word, to keep our bargains. The relationship between Canada and its Aboriginal Peoples was expressed from the beginning in the language of treaties, the language of contract and agreement. Some Canadians are now invoking, inappropriately, the language of equality in order to deny Aboriginal People any special status or entitlement. If everyone is equal why should Aboriginal People get anything not on offer to everyone else? This seemingly moral discourse of equality and universality is inappropriate in the present context because it negates explicit treaties and covenants undertaken by Canadian governments in the past.

Aboriginal Canadians constitute a special case for reasons additional to those which arise from contract. The case is predicated upon an argument of original possession, long term occupancy and a spiritual connection to the land. These arguments, coupled with a desire to preserve their distinctive culture, are arguments with which Jews are familiar in the context of Israel. To articulate these arguments for ourselves entails that we concede their use by others.

As Jews we pride ourselves on remembering. Let us also remember and respect the treaties which have structured the relationship between Canada and its Aboriginal Peoples. And let our respect for consistency give a hand to Aboriginal aspirations for a special homeland within Canadian borders.

Campus conundrum: groups forming, participation declining

By JESSICA PELT

Across Canada, Jewish groups and organizations are forming on campuses, in an effort to attract students and meet their needs while they are in university. Religious, social and special interest groups are offering a variety of activities.

Although there is greatly increased programming, along with wider availability and accessibility, however, committed participation seems to be steadily decreasing.

Through my experience over the past year and a half with Images in Toronto (the student paper), I have become aware of how reluctant students are to volunteer their time.

Today's students are products of "busy-ness" and time constraints. Our time is at a premium, as we are always trying to improve our chances for a future job and career.

Unfortunately, there are prevailing misconceptions about the word "involvement." People associate involvement with commitment and having to give large amounts of time. I must say that this is not so. While the presidents and leaders of campus groups do spend a fair amount of committed time with the group, this is not necessarily the case for all involved. There are various levels of involvement, each with its own time allotments.

Student input

During high stress weeks, programming is quite sparse. Attending, organizing or leading programs, requires too much from students. Student leaders understand other people's time restraints.

With so many Judaism-based activities now available on campuses, from "religiously oriented groups such as Kedma, Koach and Kesher, to "social" groups such as Kol HaStudentim to "something for everyone" JSUs and Hillels, as well as projects such as Images, students can choose from a wide array of programs.

Students, however, must cooperate by realizing that once in awhile, there must be time for involvement. The variety of programming cannot continue without student input. Hopefully, we will soon realize the variety that is being offered to us and become involved in any of the multitude of programs available to us.

Hebron deal not assured in cabinet

By LEORA EREN FRUCHT
Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu may have reached an agreement with Yasser Arafat, but he has not reached one with his own cabinet where there is growing opposition to the nearly-completed Hebron deal.

With the signing of the accord imminent, members of Netanyahu's coalition are threatening to scuttle the agreement and even topple the government. Members of the National Religious Party (NRP), Tsomet, the Third Way and Israel b'Aliyah – as well as some Likud MKs – are upset over the Israeli commitment to withdraw the IDF from most of the West Bank by mid-1998. Last week, Netanyahu pledged he would not yield to Palestinian demands for a firm date on a pullback.

According to the original Oslo accord, the three-stage withdrawal was to have been completed by September 1997. The mid-1998 date was a compromise proposal put forward by Jordan's King Hussein.

"Netanyahu fell into the trap prepared by Arafat," charged Shaul Yahalom of the National Religious Party. "There will be international pressure to complete the second and third pullbacks before reaching an agreement on the final status. With every withdrawal, we surrender territory that we will not be able to regain in the final agreement. That's exactly what Arafat wanted – to establish facts before the final settlement. The government must reject the agreement outright."

In the National Religious Party, views were split on what action to take. Hanan Porat, the accord's most strident opponent, urged his party to topple the government and press for new elections. "It is no longer just a Hebron agreement," said Porat. "It is now an agreement in which a government – which calls itself nationalistic – obligates itself to a near total withdrawal from Judea and Samaria."

But Education Minister Zevulun Hammer disagreed. "It would be a great mistake to topple the government. The alternative is much worse," he maintained. "The NRP has an important historical role to play in the next year and a half in shaping the final agreement, and in applying our interpretation to the third pullback."

Agriculture and the Environment Minister Rafael Eitan, a longtime opponent of the Hebron accord, vowed that his Tsomet party would vote against the agreement.

Both the NRP and Tsomet were to meet earlier this week to coordinate opposition to the accord. Meanwhile the Third Way and Israel b'Aliyah adopted a slightly more moderate stance. "Neither party will support the agreement unless the prime minister guarantees that there will be no return to the 1967 borders and no withdrawal from the Jordan Valley," said MK Yehuda Harel, spiritual leader of the Third Way.

Internal Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani said the party "opposes the third pullback in which 85 percent of territory in Judea and Samaria are to be transferred to the Palestinians, thereby jeopardizing Israeli security." But Kahalani added that the original Oslo accord, which called for a withdrawal in nine months time, "would have been suicide. Delaying it to mid-1998 gives us breathing space and a chance to test mutual commitment to the agreement."

If, despite growing opposition, the accord is ratified by the cabinet, it must then be sent to the Knesset for approval. Ironically, the prime minister can count on stronger Knesset support from the opposition than from coalition members. Likud MK Ruby Rivlin already announced he will reject the Hebron deal, calling it a violation of the basic ideology of the Revisionist movement. However, Labor and all left-wing parties have pledged unconditional support for the agreement.

Safety of Hebron Jews not guaranteed: Mordechai

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The emerging agreement on Hebron cannot provide absolute safety for its Jewish residents, Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai said recently.

"If someone thinks that there is a safe solution in Hebron, they are, in my opinion, either mistaken or misled. There is nothing absolute in Hebron. In the same city where a group of Jews live among a Palestinian population, who live right next to each other, house touching house, where they travel the same roads, move in the same places, there is no technical way to make a separation and certainly not give total security," Mordechai told a gathering at the Israel Press Club in Tel Aviv.

"The best way I see for living in Hebron is for both sides ...to come to a situation where they know how to coexist, with mutual respect," Mordechai said. "Anything else will bring about friction and conflict and bloodshed and can be very dangerous."

"Hebron is part of a process that was agreed upon and we have to progress in order to reduce the friction and conflict as much as possible," he added.

Mordechai also said that the civilian and military details of the Hebron deal were wrapped up and written down during a 10-hour meeting at the home of U.S. Ambassador Martin Indyk.

LOOKING FOR CLUES

Police inspect the ruins on a Tel Aviv street after two bombs exploded in the south part of the city on Jan. 9, wounding 13 people. Abu Ahmed Fuad, chief of the military department of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, said the bombings were a response to the shootings in Hebron although he refused to confirm or deny his group's responsibility for them. [RNS/Reuters]

Jordan's Hussein pushes completion of Hebron deal

At the heart of the controversy was the question of whether the two sides could find common ground on the issue of future IDF pullbacks from the West Bank beyond a Hebron deal.

Arafat has wanted all pullbacks to conclude by September as called for in the Oslo 2 accords. Netanyahu's proposal was for a third pullback by the end of the interim period, ending in the spring of 1999, so that it would overlap with the deadline for resolving final status issues.

For Arafat, a Jordan-brokered agreement would underline the commitment of King Hussein to the Israel-PLO Oslo accords, which he did not like when they were first announced. It would emphasize that the Hebron agreement was a multilateral affair rather than a bilateral agreement.

For Netanyahu, a Hussein-brokered agreement would help to restore his initial warm relations with the monarch, which turned frosty after the Western Wall Tunnel crisis.

Arafat told visitors last week that he interprets the Oslo 2 agreement as giving him no less than 80 percent of the West Bank before the final status talks begin. Netanyahu has yet to put forward his government's interpretation. According to Oslo 2, by the end of the three pullbacks, Israel would redeploy settlements and "specified military locations."

The U.S. Embassy had announced that Ross would be leaving the region on Sunday, because the Palestinians had yet to put forward a counterproposal and the Ross talks in Cairo were deemed unsuccessful.

But Hussein arrived in Gaza City by helicopter, was welcomed by Arafat and whisked by limousine to Arafat's seafront office, where a band played the Jordanian and PA anthems.

It was Hussein's first visit to Gaza since 1967 and the first by an Arab head of state. It was also the first visit by a foreign leader to Gaza that was not a side trip after a visit to Israel.

Barak wins key vote on internal Labor elections

By MICHAL YUDELMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Labor leadership candidate MK Ehud Barak emerged victorious from the recent party convention where his proposal for "closed primaries" was adopted, possibly paving his way to the party leadership.

MK Haim Ramon, who decided not to run for the party leadership after his proposal for "open primaries" was rejected, declared after the meeting that he would support whoever is elected Labor leader, but in the race for the party leadership he supports MK Yossi Beilin.

In a restrained, "statesmanlike" speech, Barak called on the delegates to adopt closed primaries — for party members only — to elect the party's new leader and candidate for prime minister.

"I asked myself, what is the right way? How was the late Yitzhak Rabin, who led us to victory for the first time in 20 years, elected? By closed primaries.

"Talks with hundreds of party members made it clear to me that we must not weaken the party, especially in view of the direct elections for prime minister. Don't take away the party members' power to determine our candidate for chairman and prime minister by transferring this power to anyone in the street," Barak said.

He won stormy applause from the delegates when he urged them to abandon "the tendency to bash each other and tear candidates' legs and arms off. We'll only be able to persuade the public that we are attentive and open to all its sectors if we practise this at home. Only when we form a team and a captain who convey freedom of thought, pluralism and unity in action can we ask the public to give us its confidence in the elections in the year 2,000, and preferably earlier."

The drama in the convention was provided by Ramon, whose address was punctured by frequent catcalls and "boos".

He warned Barak not to listen to the party functionaries "whispering in your ear, trying to create a dependency on them which will prevent you from reaching the broad public. You think you'll be able to shake yourself free of them.

"You are a literary man," Ramon continued. "And I know you must have read "Gulliver's Travels." You remember that picture when thousands of tiny Lilliputians wrap Gulliver with thin threads and he thinks he can easily rip them off. You too will think that, but you won't be able to break the threads and reach the public."

He called for open primaries so that "300,000, 400,000 or even 500,000 can vote for the best candidate. He will be the captain and we will all unite around him. The one elected by so many will be elected prime minister as well. But one who is elected only by the party functionaries, will be only party chairman, not prime minister."

Barak commented later, "I am not Gulliver, and I'm not surrounded by dwarves. I'm a captain with a team."

At the opening of the convention Labor Chair Shimon Peres called for unity in the party and urged the leadership contenders to act with restraint and refrain from causing a rift in the party.

A mini-drama preceded the convention, when it became apparent that all the speakers wanted to address the delegates last. At the end, convention presidium chair David Liba'i held a lottery, and Ramon won, with Barak winning the slot of one before last.

NEW YORK — The Bronfman Youth Fellowships is now accepting applications from Jewish organizations that are interested in hosting a Yozma fellow for 10 months, beginning in the fall of 1997.

In 1995, the program launched Yozma (Hebrew for resourceful initiative), which funds eight full-time, 10-month fellowship positions within the Jewish community. Yozma fellows are placed with Jewish organizations in North America and Israel that share the Bronfman Youth Fellowships' values of pluralism, Jewish learning and attachment to Judaism.

The organization must generate and implement creative ideas for Jewish engagement and continuity and must commit to involving the Yozma fellow in significant work.

Fellowship positions are available to Bronfman Youth Fellowship in Israel (BYFI) alumni and finalists who have completed their undergraduate studies, and have demonstrated a desire to use their skills within the Jewish community. During the term of their fellowship, the Yozma fellows will continue to study and participate in enrichment programs.

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Jewish Agency chair Avraham Burg refused to meet with a senior Swiss foreign ministry official last week, who wanted to discuss the issue of Jewish Holocaust-era assets in Swiss banks.

Burg said negotiations with the Swiss over funds belonging to Holocaust victims could not continue until former Swiss president Jean-Pascal Delamuraz retracted his remark that Jewish demands for a compensation fund were "blackmail."

In a letter to Swiss ambassador and task force head Thomas G. Borer, Burg said that "under the present conditions, I am not interested or able to meet with you."

Burg said Delamuraz's statement has created a reality that prevents his colleagues in the negotiations with the Swiss banks from meeting official representatives of the Swiss government until such time as the appalling statement made by the former president is retracted.

Unity government may be in the works

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Is it simply media hype, or an idea whose time has come? The notion of a national unity government in Israel has been bandied about since last May's televised debate between Benjamin Netanyahu and Shimon Peres. But of late, with polls suggesting that a majority of Israelis are in favor of it, the concept has gained a greater degree of currency.

Netanyahu initially raised the question during his debate with Peres on the eve of the general election. Netanyahu said that if elected, he would turn to the Labor party to form a unity government.

It isn't entirely clear why he brought the idea up in the first place. Perhaps he assumed that he would be unable to cobble together a government without Peres. But once safely in office, Netanyahu shelved the idea, letting it gather dust.

In November, however, Netanyahu resurrected it in a speech to the Council of Jewish Federations in Seattle.

Expressing a wish to establish a broad "national consensus" after Israel's redeployment from Hebron, Netanyahu said: "What we need to do is to...reach out to one another and to seek a dialogue...between all parts of the Israeli political spectrum."

The inference was clear, but why had Netanyahu returned to the topic once again? In all probability, for external and internal reasons. The negotiations with the Palestinians over Hebron were going nowhere, and consequently, Israel's relations with the Arab world were fast deteriorating. And within his own caucus, two of his most influential colleagues, Finance Minister Dan Meridor and Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon, were arguing that a Likud-Labor coalition would be better equipped to deal with domestic and foreign challenges.

Netanyahu scotched the proposal, explaining that his call for national consensus should not be confused with the formation of a unity government. "For such a government, we need joint policy guidelines," he said, putting his finger on the crux of the problem.

Although Likud and Labor both concur that Jerusalem should be Israel's undivided capital and that Israel should not return to the pre-1967 lines, they differ sharply on a number of other territorial issues.

Despite these differences, and despite Netanyahu's putative rejection of a wall-to-wall coalition, the idea lingers on, feeding rumor mills that a unity government may well be in the works.

The speculation, much of it promoted by the Hebrew press, has been fuelled by a series of high-level and relatively discreet meetings between Likud and Labor politicians.

Participants have included Peres, Sharon, David Levy (the foreign minister), Haim Ramon (the former health minister and Histadrut director), Yossi Beilin (Peres' confidant and a foreign policy strategist) and Michael Eitan (a Likud member of Knesset).

Sharon, his hawkish views notwithstanding, appears to be the most ardent advocate of a unity government, having described it as "a prime national necessity."

Peres, his interlocutor, has not been as consistent. In November, he was quoted as saying that "the good of the state demands unity." But in his most recent statement, delivered less than a month ago, Peres declared unequivocably, "I'm not looking for ways to join the government."

Should this be taken at face value? Probably not. According to the cynics, Peres has no desire to leave politics, and his advocacy of a unity government masks a determination to pre-empt a takeover of the Labor party by Ehud Barak, the leading contender for his job as opposition leader.

Not surprisingly, Barak opposes a unity government — not only out of a desire to thwart Peres' apparent ambitions, but out of the conviction that he can handily defeat Netanyahu in the next election.

Within the Likud, the chief opponent of unity is Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordecai, who fears that he would lose his position in a realignment of Israeli politics.

Realizing that they would be rendered redundant in a Likud-Labor alliance, the Orthodox religious parties, as well as the staunchly secular Meretz party, are also against a broadly-based coalition.

Is a unity government, three of which have been formed with mixed results since the Six Day War, imminent?

Netanyahu may ultimately opt for one, especially if he loses the confidence of his own ministers, a plurality of whom are less than keen about the Oslo peace process in general and about a withdrawal from Hebron in particular.

By last count, a majority of his colleagues in cabinet were either opposed to or doubtful about a redeployment from Hebron because of its linkage with two Palestinian demands: fixed dates for three further Israeli withdrawals from the West Bank and an armed Palestinian presence at the Tomb of the Patriarchs.

Netanyahu has promised not to yield to these demands. But if he changes his mind, he may yet consider the possibility of a unity government.

Croatian Jewish community faces difficult challenges

This is the second part of a two-part series on Croatia's Jewish community. The first part dealt with the shifting relationship between the Tudjman government and the country's Jews. The second part focuses on the challenges confronting the Jewish community as it strives to survive.

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ZAGREB, Croatia — Croatia's Jews observed Chanukah this year by celebrating the 190th anniversary of the founding of the Jewish community here in the Croatian capital.

The Festival of Lights is a perfect example of the "ever-renewed miracle of the survival of the Jewish people, their resilience, optimism and courage," Paris-based historian Diana Pinto wrote in a letter to the Zagreb community on the occasion.

"If even the smallest quantity of oil could last eight days, so even the smallest of Jewish communities has within itself, provided it wants to, the power to endure," she wrote.

Decimated by the Holocaust, constrained during the Communist era and buffeted by the war in the former Yugoslavia, the 2,000-member Croatian Jewish community is struggling to endure.

Like almost all Jewish communities in former Communist Europe, it has undergone a revival in the past decade as people have attempted to rediscover their Jewish roots.

"We are very small in number," said Igor Francetic, the Zagreb community's vice-president, "and thus have trouble finding Jewish marriage partners. We have not had a rabbi for the last 50 years. And then there is the question of identity. Still, we are trying to preserve Jewish culture and Jewish traditions."

These three issues – demographics, identity and the lack of a rabbi – as well as a lack of financial resources, are key to the community's continuity and loom foremost in local Jewish policy.

Although the chief challenges for the Croatian community are internal, the country's Jewish revival is taking place amid social and political conditions that also have an impact on the community's development.

The bloody breakup of the former Yugoslavia destroyed the Yugoslav Jewish federation and cut long-standing links between Jewish communities in Croatia and Serbia.

A wave of Jewish, as well as non-Jewish, refugees from the war in Bosnia came to both Croatia and Serbia. The war also prompted many younger Jews to emigrate as part of what one community member called a "very intensive" brain drain.

In addition, the nationalism of Croatian President Franjo Tudjman has raised concern about apparent efforts to rehabilitate the World War II Ustashe regime, the homegrown Croatian fascists who ruled wartime Croatia as a Nazi puppet state.

The issue remains problematic, despite efforts by the government to demonstrate support for Jewish causes.

Nonetheless, said historian Ivo Goldstein, "there is little open anti-Semitism in Croatia."

Some, particularly older, community members are skeptical of the chances of survival. Other members and observers are more optimistic.

"There is a community here which is aware of its roots, aware of how much damage has been done to those roots and, though it doesn't have all the answers, has some pretty good idea of how to repair some of that damage," said British Rabbi Walter Rothschild, who travelled to Zagreb to take part in the anniversary celebrations.

"It has invested a lot in recent years in communal infrastructure and in developing some very competent lay leadership, one that is honest enough to admit the gaps," he said.

Croatia had 25,000 Jews before World War II, most of them prosperous and largely assimilated. Some 20,000 were killed by the Nazis or the Ustashe regime.

Post-war Communist Yugoslavia was not a member of the Soviet bloc, and local Jews were not persecuted or isolated, as were Jews in other Communist states.

But they further assimilated into society and lost contact with religious life.

Of the community's 2,000 members today, about half are older than 60, and many are poor and alone.

Some 80 percent of community members are believed to be children of or partners in mixed marriages.

"What is happening today was unexpected and unforeseeable," said Dunja Spraic, secretary general of the Zagreb Jewish community.

"The descendants of mixed families in the first, second, and even the third generation are coming to the Jewish community, with which they feel an inexplicable bond, and are working persistently to affirm their identity."

Although aware that some members may not be accepted as Jews elsewhere, Croatian community leaders took a definite decision to open its doors to people in this situation.

"The Jewish world must understand that the Jewish community here will not survive if they have no mixed marriages," said Melita Svob, who has done in-depth research on the Croatian Jewish community.

Some 1,400 of Croatia's Jews live in Zagreb, with the rest scattered in eight other small communities.

The community centre in the heart of the city includes a small prayer room, a bar, a clubroom, an auditorium and an exhibition gallery. There is also a library, a Jewish kindergarten and a computer center sponsored by ORT.

But Zagreb is virtually the only Jewish community of its size in former Communist Central Europe that does not have a rabbi, and community leaders and members feel this lack acutely.

Currently, an Israeli teacher conducts Hebrew classes and leads services Friday nights and holidays.

Full alert declared following Lebanon fighting

By DAVID RUDGE
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — IDF and South Lebanese Army troops remained on full alert in the security zone, as tension remained high in the region following heavy fighting last week in which an IDF soldier was killed and eight were wounded. At least one Katyusha rocket hit western Galilee.

The Grapes of Wrath monitoring committee was to convene to discuss Israel's complaint over the rocket attack, the second on the same region in three weeks.

No organization has admitted responsibility for the recent incident nor for the previous attack on Dec. 13. Israel blames the Lebanese government for failing to prevent flagrant breaches of the understandings, to which it is a party, that ended the cross-border fighting during Operation Grapes of Wrath last April.

Hezbollah itself denied any involvement in the two attacks.

Uri Lubrani, the government's coordinator on Lebanon, told the Jerusalem Post that there were several possibilities.

He stressed, however, that "very little happens in the areas north of the zone from where Katyushas are fired at us without Hezbollah, in one way or another, being aware or involved in it."

The rocket attack followed a clash between Nahal Brigade troops on ambush duty in in the Taibeh region of the zone and a squad of gunmen from the Amal Shiite movement.

St.-Sgt. Ori Biton, 21, of Moshav Yakir in Samaria, was killed in the clash.

Three of the gunmen from the Amal squad were killed in the clash. Their bodies were removed from the field by troops from UNIFIL's Finnish battalion.

UNIFIL officers said that IDF soldiers who were at the scene fired warning shots at the Finnish soldiers who left the scene, but returned later to recover the bodies.

Army sources denied the claims, however, saying the IDF had informed the UN that the area was not quiet and had asked the UN soldiers to leave for their own safety. The IDF, said the sources, does not fire at UN troops in any region or under any circumstances.

Initial inquiries by Northern Command into the clash itself revealed that the Nahal troops had spotted the Amal gunmen and opened fire on them first from distances as close as 40 metres. One of the gunmen, however, was unhurt and managed to let off a single burst of automatic fire, hitting and killing Biton and wounding the five other soldiers.

There were also difficulties in evacuating the casualties from the field because of the danger of the rescue helicopter itself being hit by other gunmen in the field who managed to escape.

It is believed that another squad, from Hezbollah, was also operating in the area, either by coincidence or in coordination with the Amal unit, and these gunmen later fired several Sagger anti-tank missiles at the region where the soldiers were holed up.

The Amal squad, which probably consisted of another three or four gunmen, was apparently en route to attack an IDF or SLA patrol or convoy in the zone. The gunmen were heavily armed and well equipped and also had communication devices.

Compromise proposed on Shabbat traffic

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel's High Court of Justice has asked the nation's transportation minister to consider a compromise on Shabbat travel on a road that cuts through religious neighborhoods.

An expanded panel of seven justices Sunday suggested closing Bar Ilan Street during prayer times on the Sabbath. In exchange, the court said, another street would be open to link the main entrance to the city with the northern neighborhoods.

Transportation Minister Yitzhak Levy is expected to give his decision within the next week. Until then, the street will remain open on Shabbat.

Shabbat traffic on Bar Ilan has led to a series of often-violent demonstrations. Haredim want the street closed for the Sabbath; secular Israelis view its closure as an infringement on their freedom.

The justices offered the proposal after secular groups complained that Levy would only partially meet the recommendations of a public committee formed to review the matter. The committee had been created at the recommendation of the court.

Petitioner Lior Horev said Levy would close Bar Ilan during Sabbath prayer times, as the committee had recommended.

But, according to Horev, Levy would not fulfil the committee's other stipulation: that public transportation be provided on the Sabbath.

Haredim protest

Horev said he and other secular petitioners accepted the justices' recommendation in principle. But they have additional conditions, Horev said.

"We want to know that no other roads [in the capital] will be closed in the future," Horev told Israel Radio.

Horev also said the petitioners wanted assurances that no further violence would result.

Over the weekend, some 150 Haredim protested Sabbath travel. Two men were detained after being accused of damaging a police van.

Representatives of the Haredim community said they would not accept the court's compromise.

"We will not agree to any Sabbath violations, on any road," Yehuda Meshi Zahav told Israel Radio. "There is no [Haredi] who will agree to open one road in exchange for closing another one."

Nerve gas antidote tested on IDF soldiers

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The IDF has admitted that it has been testing a nerve gas antidote and other drugs on soldiers for decades, but dismissed charges that soldiers are forced to participate in the experiments.

Army Surgeon General Brig.-Gen. Yehoshua Shemer said recruits today are being used in medical experiments, but only on a voluntary basis and soldiers must sign a waiver to participate.

"There are no secrets here," Shemer said, adding that the drug being tested was Pirsiglobin. "It protects against the very grave effects of nerve gas. If you take it before being exposed it neutralizes most of the serious effects of nerve gas."

Shemer's statements came following a report on Israel Radio that in the 1970s and 1980s, soldiers were forced to take drugs, some of which were reportedly banned. Recently, Givati soldiers have been involved in the latest experiments and their parents have urged them to quit, Israel Radio said.

The army declined to comment on the matter and referred all queries to the radio interview given by Shemer. Shemer said any and all medical research in the IDF is first approved by the Helsinki Commission on Human Rights. He also admitted that there were other experiments being conducted as well.

He said the nature of the drug demanded that soldiers be tested in pressure situations and that recruits presented the best suitable group.

Gulf War

He said medical checks were done two months after the experiments to determine if there were any side effects, but none were found.

"We are six years after the Gulf War. At that time, when we did not have solutions to the threat [of chemical attack] we were very severely criticized. It is important for the public to know that we continue to increase our capability to present a package of protection that not only protects, but also neutralizes" the threat, Shemer told Army Radio.

He said that soldiers had the right to refuse to participate and that 30 per cent had chosen not to be part of the latest experiment.

But some participants said those who volunteered for the experiments were absolved from guard duties and were not bothered by the base sergeant major, which was a form of payment.

Following the initial report, dozens of people telephoned the radio station saying they too had been subjected to the experiments and that any trace of the research had disappeared since it was not noted in their medical file.

"They forced us to take these pills three times a day," said Alex Shamir, who was in the armored corps in the early 1970s. "The commanders stood and watched to make sure we swallowed them." Shamir said he suffered from diarrhea and nausea.

"We didn't sign any consent form. They just took us as guinea pigs and forced us to take it," Shamir said.

Shemer said records today are meticulously kept, but he couldn't speak for what happened 25 years ago.

Health care funding slammed

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Health care funds are not being allocated to those most in need, according to a local administrator in the field.

Mark Adler, president of Ontario Community Support Association and executive director of St. Clair West Services for Seniors, says he deplores the recent funding increase given to physicians, especially since they come at a time when seniors and other vulnerable groups are experiencing cutbacks in both health care services and drug benefits.

Adler recently spoke to the Cranbrooke Friendship Club of the United Jewish People's Order about reforming Ontario's health care system

"The government isn't interested in reforming those areas of health care that need reforming... No government is willing to tackle the basic problem" of the fee-for-service method of paying doctors, a major financial drain on health care resources, Adler said.

Thousands of health care practitioners like nurses and orderlies are getting laid off while doctors are pocketing more money, he said.

He said the quality of hospital care is deteriorating as a result of cost-saving measures such as the replacement of registered nurses by health care staff with less training.

The problem is made worse by a growing trend to contract out nursing services to private agencies who are paying RNs considerably lower wages than the hospitals do, he added.

To reduce expenses, others in the health service sector are also turning to private companies to provide home care services because private sector workers are paid about 30 percent less than their government-funded counterparts, he said.

Adler advocates that physicians become salaried workers. A "truly-socialized" medical system entails that physicians be employees of the state, he said, describing the current system as "capitalistic." The government is "essentially an insurance company" which funds "self-employed practitioners," he said.

The restructuring and closing of hospitals in Metro is necessary because the area is over-serviced, he said. "It is a good policy to re-allocate services where they are needed."

He also suggested deploying resources more effectively: hi-tech medical equipment should be available around the clock and hospitals should designate a number of beds for care at the nursing-home level.

Many of the financial flaws in our health care system are the result of "a distribution problem," Adler said. "We can afford a good system, [but] the federal and provincial government have to understand the prerequisites of the system."

Menopause program helps women deal with realities of mid-life

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Fifty million North American women are about to turn 50, says Debbie Cowitz, a certified adult educator who has created a series of programs to help women understand and cope with the myths and realities of mid-life.

"Menopause is not a disease," Cowitz says. "It is a transition to freedom, creativity and opportunity."

Trained at OISE and Jewish Family and Child Service, the 63-year-old mother of four and grandmother of five has organized groups in the Toronto area and at the University of Guelph for 10 years. Mid-life is just another change is the lesson she has taught hundreds of women between 40 and 60 who have had to deal with many changes in their lives.

"I teach them that mid-life is a positive, natural and exciting experience," Cowitz says.

Recently, at a workshop at the University of Guelph, she presented a program titled Women, Self-Esteem and Sexuality. After the seminar, a young women was so impressed that she gave her mother a gift of enrolment in a future workshop.

On Jan. 26, Cowitz will present an all-day seminar titled Mid-Life, Menopause and More: A Day of Exploration. It will include strategies for dealing with change, goal setting, looking at what you are saying goodbye to and what you are saying hello to, and exploring the three stages of menopause.

The peri-menopause, or early signs of menopause, which could start as early as your late 30s, may be accompanied by sleep and mood changes. Cessation of menses is explored with its accompanying sense of loss. And post-menopause requires decision making on lifestyle changes and hormonal therapy.

"Sometimes you feel so lousy, you wish you could find out how to feel better. Now I know," wrote one of the participants after a recent session.

Cowitz, who is married to lawyer Ron Cowitz, has appeared on television and recently presented a session at the McGill Club.

She says she knows how to cope with change. "This was a new beginning for me — a new identity, a new way of being — serene, peaceful and passionate about life."

Changing careers is nothing new for Cowitz, who has worked as a nursery school supervisor, a membership coordinator for B'nai Brith Canada, a professional matchmaker and now, as a mid-life educator.

Although she has concentrated her efforts on women, she says that men also face mid-life changes and she is planning to present sessions for men as well.

"My perspective is a non-medicalized model which helps women feel comfortable and empowers them to make informed decisions about the alternatives available to them."

Future Bakery is a family-run business.
It all started with my Polish grandfather who was a master baker in the court of the Russian Czar Nicholas. In 1952 he and my Ukranian grandmother moved to Canada and started future Bakery. They were looking forward to the "Future" in their new country!
Today my father and I run the bakery and we still use my grandparents' recipies.
So the next time you eat at future, you'll see why, it is more than just another bakery!

Hockey hopefuls vie for spot on Maccabiah team

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It was kind of late in the season for an evaluation camp, but none of the 48 players on hand seemed to mind. Some had flown in from Vancouver and Winnipeg and there was a core of skaters present from Toronto and Montreal.

Following a warm-up and some preliminary drills, they settled down to an intrasquad scrimmage that saw its share of bone-crunching hits, nifty dekes and top-notch goaltending as the hockey hopefuls showed their wares in a bid to make the team that that will represent Canada at next summer's Maccabiah Games in Israel.

The talent level was high and did not fail to impress head hockey man Charles Henry, governor of the Hull Olympiques major junior team and the man charged with assembling Canada's entry at the Maccabiah.

"I'm pleasantly surprised," Henry said part way through the try-out at a North York rink. "There are a lot of guys here who've played pro or were drafted by the NHL."

Skaters whose credentials had been vetted by the Maccabiah organizers took part in the three-hour workout and scrimmage. Of the 48 prospects who skated in Toronto, about 23 are expected to survive the cut. Thirteen skaters from Montreal who made the trip had already survived one round of cuts in Quebec.

Those hoping to wear the Maple Leaf at the Maccabiah will face one or perhaps two further evaluation camps before the final roster is selected, said Gideon Lee, Maccabiah's hockey man in Ontario and the West.

Those who make the final cut will form a core group that will be supplemented at a later stage by professional, major junior and college players who were not available for the mid-winter tryouts, Henry added.

Judging from a random selection of four players, Henry had reason for some optimism. Montrealer Jon Grand, for one, has plenty of professional experience. The 24-year-old goalie laced 'em up last season for the Empire State Cobras in the Roller Hockey International league. Before that he played for Lakeland Warriors of the Sunshine Hockey League, based in Florida. In 1995, he made a Team Canada squad selected from among players in minor pro leagues, including the International, American, Colonial, East Coast and other leagues for a tournament in Las Vegas.

Grand was enthusiastic about the prospect of playing in Israel: "It would defintely be a good opportunity to see [the country] and an experience I'll never forget. It's a good opportunity through hockey to see Israel."

Earl Morris, 31, a 6-foot, 183-pound centre, hails from Montreal but now lives in Toronto. In his younger days, he played for Longueil and Drummondville in the Quebec Major Junior Hockey League, one of the three top junior leagues in Canada. As a 15-year-old midget, he skated in the Air Canada Cup for Lac St. Louis Lions.

Morris was high on the prospect of wearing Canada's jersey at the Maccabiah Games. "I like the idea of representing my country," he said. "I represented my province already."

Andy Marcus, 29, lives in Toronto but he played four years of college hockey at the University of Guelph. A 6-foot-1 defenceman, Marcus said he loves to play high level, competitive hockey. "A big part of the drawing card" is combining that with a trip to Israel, he said.

If he makes the final cut, Simon Margolis will no doubt be one of the veterans on the team. At 39, Margolis acknowledged he'd be considered "an oldtimer. This could be a bit of a lark. I wanted to find out if I could make this thing, to see if I could stack up," he said.

A 6-foot centre who weighs 175 pounds, Margolis plays recreational hockey for the Arbutus club in Vancouver, but as a younger man he skated in a more competitive league, playing Junior A for the Vancouver Junior Canucks.

"This is the first time for hockey in the Maccabiah Games," he said. "I thought, what the hell, it'll be a lot of fun. I've known guys who've gone before and they said it's a great expereince."

There was some pretty good talent on the ice and some exciting close-in action when 48 hockey hopefuls tried out for a spot on the team that will represent Canada at next summer's Maccabiah Games in Israel. [Paul Lungen photo]

Another player boasting strong credentials at the tryout camp was Randal Shore of Winnipeg. The speedy centre plays for the Charleswood Hawks, champions of the Manitoba junior hockey league.

Creating a strong attachment to Israel has always been one of the raisons d'être of the Maccabiah Games. And while Canada has won its share of medals, the inclusion of hockey for the first time has opened up the opportunity for some of the Jewish community's best athletes to participate.

In addition to those who tried out in Toronto, who will make up the bulk of the team, spots are being left open on the team for professional players — if they want them. One former pro, Torontonian Brian Wilks, was on hand at the rink helping supervise the practice and coaching one of the two squads in the scrimmage (along with George Benton and Bill Purcell). Wilks, who had stints with the Los Angeles Kings and Cape Breton Oilers, said he'd love to play in the Maccabiah and perhaps serve as a player/coach.

"It's something that would be a great experience. I've never been to Israel. I think it'll be a lot of fun," he said.

With Jacques Demers, Montreal Canadiens' Stanley Cup-winning coach, behind the bench, Henry heading the management team, and Jean Beliveau serving as Maccabiah's honorary chef de mission, several professional players may be enticed to signing on for the Maccabiah Games. That, in turn, could reinforce the image of hockey as the Canadian team's glamor event in Israel.

Canada will face off against the United States, Israel and Russia in the four-team competition, which will be held in July on the new Olympic-size ice surface in Metulla.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our third annual Purim Art Contest. We are asking students in elementary schools to submit drawings about Purim.

Who can enter: Children from grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on March 20. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small. Please paint, draw or color bright, bold, colorful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. And you can even give them a title.
Please send us your name, address, phone number, school and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Rd., Suite 205, North York, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, March 3, 1997.

We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen for publication as "winners". The judges will base their decision on a number of factors such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 7, 1997.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 20, 1997. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

'Open skies' aids Israel's economy

BY HAIM SHAPIRO
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israel's Transportation Ministry has revealed the findings of a study that indicated that the "open skies" policy brought in an additional $54 million for the national economy, even if it meant a loss to El Al.

By open skies, the survey was referring to the change in government policy in November 1994, which opened competition between airlines, allowing charter companies to operate with greater freedom, enabling foreign airlines to carry a greater percentage of the passengers to and from Israel, and easing restrictions on fare slashing.

The study examined the effects of the change in policy on airline fares and tourism to Israel. It showed that El Al's income from ticket sales had dropped by $15 million, as a result in the reduction of income per passenger.

The study also showed that the policy had resulted in an increase by six percent in the number of tourists from western Europe, due to lower fares and better airline service.

The lower fares, Transportation Minister Yitzhak Levy said, had made Israel a more attractive tourist destination.

Between 1993 and 1996, the study showed, a record number of countries had signed new aviation agreements with Israel, establishing regular flights between Israel and Jordan, South Korea, India, Thailand, Slovakia, Moldova, Kazakhstan, Belarus and China.

Mega mall in the works

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Usually, it doesn't take much prompting to get Montreal developer David Azrieli to sing the praises of his ever-expanding empire of malls in Israel.

In describing his fourth and latest venture, the Shalom Project, however, Azrieli lets the numbers speak for themselves. It will be the largest office and commercial complex (over eight acres) ever built in Israel (and, for that matter, the Middle East), and the third largest office and retail complex in the world.

Its three office towers, ranging from 34 to 42 storeys high and built in the shapes of a circle, square and rectangle, will encompass over 1.3 million square feet in expandable office space by the time the last tower is topped off (expected by the year 2000).

The towers will be connected at the base by a shopping mall, expected to be opened by the spring of 1998, consisting of over 250,000 square metres of retail space, enough to accommodate 160 stores. There will be parking for 3,600 cars.

The total cost? Over $600 million (Cdn), financed by a consortium headed by Bank Hapoalim and Bank Leumi.

For Azrieli's Canit Hashalom Investments, which over the last decade has erected successful "Canion" malls in Ramat Gan, Beersheva and Jerusalem, the Shalom Project, despite being delayed by a lengthy legal battle between Azrieli and a former partner (which Azrieli eventually won) and a glut of Tel Aviv office space, is now running on schedule and no gamble at all, Azrieli said.

"It is not a concern," he said in an interview with The CJN. "I have the best product, a quality location, the best technology, everything."

Azrieli was alluding to what will be the office complex's state-of-the-art systems, ranging from the latest in high-speed elevators to service infrastructures.

These factors, he suggested, are what prompted Bezek, Israel's national telephone (and largest domestic) company, to recently lease 22 storeys of the "triangle" tower.

Another factor was location. The Shalom Project is being built at a hub intersection of Israel's national highway, between Tel Aviv's centre and key travelling routes and urban centres in all directions. There will also be easy pedestrian access via Israel's bus and train systems.

Azrieli said Bezek's decision to go for Canit's bid came as a surprise to industry handicappers, who were betting that Bezek would move from its current location in Ramat Gan's "diamond district" to a new office tower being built by Ashtrom, almost right across the street.

Azrieli also noted specific Canadian elements in the Shalom Project.

"Anchor" stores at the shopping mall will include Supersol, owned by the Israeli arm of the Bronfman family's Montreal-based Claridge Ltd., and Superpharm, owned by Torontonian Murray Koffler.

The mall selection of retail and commercial outlets, not surprisingly, is expected to draw most of the public attention in Israel's consumption-driven culture.

Besides having such by-now mandatory features as a food court and cinema complex (with nine theatres), Azrieli said a special effort is being made to draw prestigious haute couture outlets, so as to make the mall, in the words of its glossy brochure, the "fashion boulevard" of Israel.

Individual visit is $8, series of six visits $30. Beth Sholom, Jan. 28, 8 p.m. To register, call Carol at 416-789-3213. Registration limited.

In the Spotlight

• Barry Brown, 42, Toronto-based freelance journalist and one-time student council president at Forest Hill Junior High, was recently dubbed an "Ed Sullivan for the '90s" by a local newspaper. The reason? Brown, who has always dabbled in show business, was host of a popular Sunday night variety show at the Poor Alex Theatre.

To cope with the show's success, Brown has upped the scale, moved the venue and changed the night. Now called Maximum Cabaret, it's playing weekly at the Bloor Street Cinema, 506 Bloor St. W., east of Bathurst. Brown's talent search is non-ending: singers, musicians, comics, dancers, actors, authors and poets are encouraged to call 416-778-8606. Call the same number for showtimes and other details.

Poet's songs pluck Jewish heartstrings

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —A sold-out cabaret audience of 200 responded warmly to songs of Mordecai Gebirtig, the Polish poet murdered in the Krakow ghetto in 1942, who knew so well how to pluck the heartstrings of Jewish life.

A carpenter who composed songs at his bench for his wife and three daughters, only to have them passed from one person to another because they were so valid, Gebirtig touched every base of the working persons' world.

A mother who frets that her young son, Yankele, still wets his bed at night though no doubt he will grow up to be a learned merchant; a father who wonders if he'll be lonely after marrying off three daughters, a headache though that proves to be; a mother who scolds her son for wanting kartofl zup mit shvomen (potato soup with mushrooms) enjoyed by the rich when she has only knobel (garlic) soup to offer; a paen to a Jewish pickpocket, Avremel; a Jewish woman who advises her non-Jewish goat shepherd friend to find himself a gentile girl. All these are among Gebirtig's tales.

And they were vividly interpreted to the Yiddishland Cafe audience by folksinger Batsheva, clarinetist Martin Van de Van and accordionist Sasha Luminsky. The concert, produced by Tania Reinhartz, was presented by the Work-

More Fairy Tale Roads

Rising from a knoll deep in a Hessian forest, Schloss Sababurg is ringed by a distinctive old hedge of brambles, through which the Grimm Brothers were forced, nearly two centuries ago, to cut a path in order to reach the castle, which was then a noble ruin. (The castle dates from the 14th, the brambles from the 16th century.)

Collectors of fairy tales and legends, the Grimms were quick to identify the castle with Sleeping Beauty — the fairy-tale princess who, having fallen under an evil spell, sleeps for 100 years in a castle that also sleeps, only to be awakened by a kiss from a prince who has hacked his way through the thickets.

Today, half of Sababurg is still an eerie ruin ringed by brambles, its vast sward a nature park in which bison, elks and wild horses wander. Newly awakened, the castle's other half has been converted into a deluxe honeymoon hotel set in a romantic stone tower. Much in demand, its eight rooms are decorated with antique spinning wheels, tapestries, four-poster beds and plush rugs. (Daytime visitors may have coffee and cake, or a full meal in the hotel restaurant.)

Some 30 kilometres south, the Grimm Brothers Museum in Kassel illustrates the immense influence of Jacob and Wilhelm on world literature; the fairy-tales they gathered from simple peasants have been traced back to Eastern Europe, India, Persia and the Middle East. The Grimms also pioneered an early German dictionary and thus influenced the shape of the language itself.

Towns on Germany's so-called Fairy-Tale Road, such as Gottingen, Alsfeld and Marburg, have enshrined the Grimms in historic sites, statuary and plaques. Along this or any other route in Germany, readers of this column may find many other points of interest, some inevitably pertaining to Judaic themes.

While I strolled past the many half-timbered houses and medieval structures of Gottingen's picturesque downtown, for example, my eye was drawn to an ordinary street-sign: Judengasse (the street of the Jews). Several blocks along this nondescript boulevard, which seems to tell nothing of its past, the town museum beckoned. Three marks gave admittance to a labyrinthine suite of rooms in which the region's history was chronologically laid out from the prehistoric to the post-war periods.

Far from being overlooked, the most barbaric era was covered extensively. Photographs showed mass rallies outside the town hall, bedecked with the odious red-black-and white regalia. Relics of the former Jewish community — religious objects, Torah curtains, items from destroyed synagogues — filled two rooms.

Housed in a former brewery once owned by a Jewish family, the town museum in Alsfeld contains a Torah ark, rescued, the local guide explained, from a torched synagogue the day after Kristallnacht. I offered to translate the Hebrew inscription: Yodea leifnei mi atah omed, Know before whom you are standing. Later, seeing my interest, the guide took me to a nearby 19th-century Jewish cemetery, which he and others have labored to restore.

In Marburg, the remains of a medieval synagogue were unearthed three years ago during the routine excavation of a former parking lot. In use from about 1250 to 1450, the building was evidently rectangular with a central sexpartite vault; one of the recovered vaults features a keystone carved with a star of David.

"This," a guide exclaimed proudly, pointing into the rectangular pit, "is by far the most exciting excavation in Marburg."

Remnants of only about a dozen medieval synagogues of that size have been found in Central Europe, according to Ulrich Klein, an official connected with the dig through the Freies Institut fur Bauferschung und Dokumentation.

"The new excavated building in Marburg is a more important example," he said.

It is also an important example of how modern Germany is doing all it can not to forget its history and to recover its Jewish history in particular.

Guidebook recommendation: Despite the newsprint-quality paper and a lack of color pages, The Rough Guide to Germany ($23.99) provides about the most extensive maps and information available, including details on accommodation, restaurants, nightlife and special-interest activities.

Poets' songs aimed at working people

"Gebirtig wrote not for the posh salon but for the workers," said chair Aaron Feiner. "It was his lyric of the burning town (Es brent) that became his best known. He wrote it in 1938 after the Polish pogrom of Pshytik and sounded a call of alarm of a coming apocalypse. His concerns were for the destiny of the Jewish workingman and his desire for a better world."

The themes of Gebirtig's work were warmly embraced by Batsheva who had no hesitation in identifying with her opening number March of the Jobless. In Yiddish she sang: "They have no home or bed; still they share with each other whatever they possess. They, the creators of wealth for others, are repaid with hunger, poverty and unemployment."

That Batsheva enjoys her work is much evident in her rousing rendition of the song about the argument between a wife and husband over which side of the family the next baby will be named and its resolution in the hope that twins will be born.

Osem food products exported to more than 30 countries

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Customers of Marks & Spencer who purchase the British department store's own crackers, sold under the St. Michael label, are likely unaware that they may be eating a product manufactured by Israeli food giant Osem.

The crackers are even kosher, although some of the company's private label products don't bear a hechsher, said Dan Propper, managing director and chief executive officer of the Osem Group of Companies during a fall visit to Toronto. Propper, president of the Manufacturers' Association of Israel, was brought here by State of Israel Bonds to speak on a panel.

Osem, established in Israel in 1942 as a pasta manufacturer, is also known for its biscuits, snacks, dehydrated soup mixes, condiments and frozen products making up some of the more than 1,500 products it manufactures. In most categories it has a market share of over 50 percent, according to a company information sheet.

Propper, a graduate of Technion-Israel Institute of Technology with a degree in chemical engineering and food technology, represents the third generation of his family in the business.

In 1892, Propper's grandfather established a pasta factory in the Czech Republic. His father eventually took over its management, and after immigrating to Palestine in 1938 started his own small pasta manufacturing facility with a partner the following year.

Two more partners joined them and an eventual total of seven families, five of whom remain involved with the company, established Osem in 1942.

In 1990 Canadian-owned Claridge Israel Inc. bought 33 percent of the company's shares.It became a public company in 1992; 25 percent of its shares are traded on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange. This year Claridge sold its shares to Nestle, which now owns 40 percent of the shares, Propper said.

Today almost 3,200 people work in 11 Osem production plants throughout Israel. Sales have quadrupled since the mid-1980s to $355 million (US) in 1995 and were expected to exceed $410 million in 1996. Over the years it has acquired, among others, Froumine (bakery products) and Mitzli (juices and nectars).

Osem products are marketed in over 30 countries. A joint venture in Egypt is being discussed, Propper said. The company already has plants in China and India in cooperation with local business partners.

Canada is considered a major export destination – number 5 or 6, said Propper – but the company's three main export markets are the United States, the United Kingdom and Eastern Europe.

New products, which constitute about 15 percent of the product range, are introduced only after fine tuning and much testing on focus groups. "Therefore our rate of success is quite high," said Propper.

One of Osem's most successful products in Israel has been a vitamin-fortified children' snack called Bamba, said Propper. Also popular in its snack-food line is Bissli, which is available here.

In recent years, Osem has introduced a number of low-fat product lines, although the company shies away from health foods because "they never taste like the original one," Propper said.

An oat bran cracker, developed because of oat bran's cholesterol-lowering properties, was off the market within a year. "The craze was over and so was the product," summed up Propper.

"People love to eat, and eating is not just a story of fulfilling hunger [but] part of the enjoyment of life."

Story of anti-Nazi resistance told

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Helmuth James von Moltke, the scion of a distinguished German family, was one of the founders of the Kreisau Circle, a clandestine group dedicated to the overthrow of the Nazi regime.

A conservative aristocrat whose forebears had faithfully served Germany, von Moltke was driven into opposition by the sheer weight of his conscience.

Having decided he could no longer pay obedience to a state dedicated to committing atrocities in Germany's name, von Moltke made the fateful decision to resist Hitler.

Witness Against Hitler, to be screened by Vision TV on Jan. 23 at 8:30 p.m., dramatizes the circumstances which prompted him – and others – to break with Hitler.

The film, a British production starring James Wilby as von Moltke and Helen McRory as his loyal wife Freya, unfolds over an eight year period starting in 1937.

Von Moltke, an international lawyer in the employ of the government, is first seen on his estate, relaxing in the company of his pregnant wife. All seems idyllic.

The scene shifts forward to 1940. Von Moltke is no longer content. He is disgusted by Germany's dictatorial policies and its conduct of the war, particularly its attacks against neutral shipping.

The Kreisau Circle is formed, and at its first meeting, the participants exchange visions of a post-Nazi Germany and decry the pagan racism into which German nationalism has sunk.

Witness Against Hitler than moves toward its climax. It is 1943 and Von Moltke has become totally disenchanted with the Nazis. Yet, naively enough, he is opposed to violence as the means by which to rid Germany of Hitler.

At this juncture, there is a reference to the persecution of Jews, when a Kreisau Circle member states that a democratic Germany will reinstate the rights lost by its Jewish citizens.

When von Moltke next appears, in January 1944, he is in prison, having been arrested on suspicion of being a political dissident. In the wake of the July 1944 plot on Hitler's life, von Moltke is charged with treason and with the crime of having helped Jews escape from Germany.

As he languishes in a dank cell, growing despondent, Freya comes under SS pressure to betray him. She does not. Witness Against Hitler ends as he bids farewell to her on the day of his execution.

This is a slow, low-budget film, but well worth a viewer's time. North Americans scarcely know anything about the anti-Nazi resistance movement in Germany, and while Witness Against Hitler can hardly be described as definitive, it is a fairly good introduction to the topic.

VEAL ROAST ORIENTAL

3 lbs. lean veal shoulder (flat), boneless
2/3 cup soy sauce
2/3 cup plum jam
2/3 cup honey
1 1/2 tsp. fresh ginger, minced
2 garlic cloves, minced
1/2 cup white wine

Pierce both sides of roast with a fork and place in a large plastic bag. Thoroughly combine soy sauce, jam, honey, ginger and garlic. Pour into bag over roast. Press out air and tie bag securely. Turn bag several times to coat meat well. Refrigerate for at least 8 hours, turning bag occasionally.

Preheat oven 325°F. Remove meat from marinade, reserving liquid. Roll and, using string, tie meat tightly. Place on a rack which has been placed in a shallow pan of water. Brush generously with marinade. Bake for 2 hrs. or until meat thermometer registers 170°F.

Brush several times with marinade while baking. (Check to make sure there is always water in pan.) Cover loosely with foil for last 30 minutes or if top is browning too quickly. Combine 3/4 cup remaining marinade with wine, heat until boiling and simmer 1 min. Spoon sauce over roast or serve on side. Yield: 6-8 servings.

Taking stock of Operation Grapes of Wrath

By GERALD M. STEINBERG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

The number of Hezbollah attacks and incidents of IDF retaliation in south Lebanon is increasing again and the impact of last year's Operation Grapes of Wrath is still being hotly debated.

Opinion

Some military officials and analysts argue that the massive IDF effort that followed the attacks on Israeli civilians and soldiers strengthened Hezbollah. Others point to the Israeli campaign, including the attacks in Beirut, as an effective deterrent against another major round of conflict.

In considering options for a response to the current situation, the case for both these views should be studied.

Those who argue that Shimon Peres' pre-election military campaign did more damage than good point to the increased strength of Hezbollah and its allies in south Lebanon.

The Iranian-supported and trained fundamentalists reportedly now control at least 90 percent of south Lebanon, leaving only a very small wedge of villages aligned with Israel. Hundreds of local residents provide the information used in preparing attacks.

This wider support network has enabled Hezbollah to increase its intelligence capabilities regarding the movements and operations of IDF forces in the region. The terrorists are also able to move more freely, mounting effective attacks and causing greater Israeli losses.

Iranian deliveries of weapons to Hezbollah forces in Lebanon have also increased, with reports of large-scale shipments of anti-tank missiles and longer-range Katyushas via Damascus and Cyprus.

The Iranian foreign minister's visit to Damascus a few weeks ago signified the increasing cooperation between the fundamentalist regime in Tehran and that of Syrian President Hafez al-Assad.

These deliveries have enabled Hezbollah to replenish its stockpiles and build new underground storage sites, allowing it to withstand Israeli air attacks. In addition, newer and more powerful anti-tank weapons and rocket launchers have enhanced Hezbollah's military options.

The operation ended suddenly after the IDF mistakenly shelled a UN camp where hundreds of civilians had sought refuge. Hezbollah terrorists had used the outskirts of the camp to fire rockets into Israel, drawing a massive artillery response. This tragedy and Peres' planned trip to Washington to bolster his election campaign ended the IDF attacks prematurely.

At the time, the IDF succeeded in finding and destroying a number of terrorist ammunition storage sites and brought activity in Hezbollah strongholds to a halt. There is good reason to conclude that in another round, without the political limits dictated by elections, the Netanyahu government would maintain pressure longer and pursue the Hezbollah forces with even greater intensity.

In Grapes of Wrath, the politicians and investors in Beirut were reminded of the cost of allowing fundamentalist terrorists to operate freely. The deep bombing raids on Beirut, including the attack on power stations after a transformer in Kiryat Shmona was hit by Hezbollah rockets, constituted a considerable setback to the efforts to rebuild Lebanon and Beirut, particularly after the long civil war.

The tens of billions of dollars that have been invested in this reconstruction effort by Lebanon's leading families, including the prime minister's, were put at risk. Beirut was cut off from south Lebanon and hundreds of thousands of refugees moved into the capital.

Since then, there have been signs of tension in Beirut, including protests against the Syrian occupation and even bombings against Syrian targets.

Another, more extensive round of fighting in Lebanon would be very costly, frightening off investors and stopping the reconstruction program.

The Lebanese leadership is advertising Lebanon as "open for business again," but further IDF raids would have a more powerful impact than any PR would. Investors would lose hundreds of millions of dollars. Lebanon's efforts to get taken off the U.S. government's list of dangerous locations would be halted.

Hundreds of thousands of Syrian workers employed in reconstruction projects would suddenly be out of work, becoming a liability for the government in Damascus. The level of tension between Beirut and Damascus would climb.

Both the Lebanese and Syrian leaderships have a strong interest in preventing renewed fighting from reaching the level of last year's campaign. They know that if the IDF is provoked, the response will last longer and be more intensive than Grapes of Wrath. If fighting begins, escalation could not be ruled out. Ultimately, instability and conflict could also weaken Syria's control of Lebanon, reviving the local opposition to the Syrian occupation.

Hezbollah may have increased its tactical and operational capabilities in south Lebanon; but in a wider sense, both politically and militarily, it is more vulnerable than last year.

The risks of escalation are high. If the attacks continue, Syria, Iran, and Hezbollah could come under pressure from both outside and inside Lebanon to reach an agreement with Israel, one that would disarm the terrorists and allow the IDF finally to withdraw.

Arafat enters Hebron

By JON IMMANUEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

HEBRON — In a conciliatory speech to the people of Hebron, Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat last Sunday told a crowd of some 50,000 that all the Israeli people had made peace with the Palestinians and the Palestinians seek no confrontation with the town's Jews.

He made no allusion to the fact that 20 percent of Hebron is still under IDF control. "Hebron," he said three times, "is liberated."

Arafat flew into Hebron by helicopter. Fears that only a small crowd would greet him were soon dispelled, as people poured out of the grounds of the former Israeli military headquarters, where he spoke from the balcony.

"We have made a peace agreement with all the Israeli people – Likud, Labor, Meretz, Shas, Kahalani," Arafat said. "There were 87 votes in the Knesset for peace, 87, 87, and that is something new in the Middle East...Therefore I say that all forces of peace in Israel have voted for this decision and together we will make a just and comprehensive peace in the Middle East."

Arafat went on to say that, "I tell the settlers in Hebron we do not want confrontation."

Arafat's words contrasted with those of West Bank Preventive Security Chief Col. Jibril Rajoub. Rajoub told a crowd of 3,000 that the settlers have no place in Hebron and are "a stone on our chest."

A statement by senior Israeli security officials condemned Rajoub's words as "grave incitement and a blatant violation of the spirit of the agreement, which Rajoub took part in reaching."

Referring to Jerusalem, Arafat spoke guardedly. Hebronites, he said, had protected the Arabness of Jerusalem, referring to the large number of Jerusalemites of Hebron origin.

"A promise is a promise, an oath is an oath unto Jerusalem," he added, and later he spoke of his hope to pray both in Hebron's Ibrahimiye Mosque (the Machpela Cave) and Jerusalem's Al-Aksa Mosque.

"Hebron is the beginning of the process which will bring us areas B and C and will lead to an independent Palestinian state," he said, but did not specifically mention the area of the state nor did he mention Jerusalem as its capital.

In previous speeches marking the handover of Palestinian towns to his control, Arafat always strongly emphasized the matter of Jerusalem, usually repeating over and over that it is the capital of Palestine.

"If Israel fulfils all its obligations, we shall fulfil ours," Arafat said, repeating almost word for word Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's own demands.

Arafat gave the impression of being satisfied with the accord struck with Netanyahu. "In the agreement for the first time there is a letter of assurance from the United States," he said.

In a spot interview with CNN, he said of Netanyahu, "Now we can say we are friends and we are

Jewish groups may face overhaul

By DAVID LAZARUS
and RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporters

TORONTO — As The CJN went to press Monday, the Council of Jewish Federations (CJF) Canada was wrapping up a two-day meeting here to discuss, among other things, the very future of national Jewish advocacy agencies.

CJF Canada officials provided no details of the closed-door sessions. UJA-funded national organizations were represented, including Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS).

The CJF, Canadian Jewish federations' umbrella body and CJC's main funder, set off shock waves recently when a memo it sent to CJC leaders contained several controversial proposals. They included moving CJC's national office to Ottawa and absorbing CJC regional offices in Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver into those cities' local federations.

The proposals were later downplayed by CJF Canada president Richard Vineberg, who said they were merely intended to aid CJC in its "strategic planning process" and were nothing more than starting points for discussions (CJN, Jan. 2).

Vineberg told The CJN last Friday the meeting would focus on "strategic planning issues."

"Any major change has to be seriously discussed. [Because it is controversial] doesn't mean you can't talk about it."

In anticipation of the CJF meeting, a sense of urgency was close to palpable at last week's CJC Quebec region's executive meeting in Montreal, where members unanimously vowed to fight the possibility of a move of CJC's national

Hebron Agreement

JERUSALEM — A strong earthquake whose epicentre was near Cyprus was felt last week along the coast of Israel from Nahariya in the north to Ashkelon in the south.

No damages or injuries were reported from last Monday's quake, which measured 6.2 on the Richter scale.

Tremors were also felt in Egypt, Lebanon and Jordan.

Gay Partner Benefits

JERUSALEM – A Tel Aviv court has ordered the Israel Defence Force to grant the homosexual partner of a deceased IDF career officer all the benefits awarded surviving spouses.

In its precedent-setting ruling, which forces the IDF to recognize gay unions, the court's appeals committee accepted the appeal of Tel Aviv resident Adir Steiner.

Steiner had appealed to the committee on the grounds that he was publicly known as the companion of Col. Doron Maisel, an officer in the medical corps who died of cancer in 1991.

BONN — The Bonn-based Journal for German and International Politics has decided to award author Daniel Goldhagen its annual Democracy Prize for his book, Hitler's Willing Executioners.

In August, the book sold out its first German edition of 40,000 copies in less than a week.

PARIS — A French high school teacher has been suspended for engaging in Holocaust denial.

Vincent Reynouard, 27, who teaches math in the Normandy town of Honfleur, was found to be using the school computer to file documents denying the Holocaust, and the fax machine to send the writings to his followers. He was also found giving his students statistical equations regarding the rate of mortality in Nazi concentration camps.

Reynouard denies any wrongdoing and claims that he is the victim of a witch hunt.

BEGIN ENCOUNTERS HOSTILITY IN BRITAIN

A couple of hours after Menachem Begin, Israel's leader of the right-wing Gahal party, flew into London, the management of the Royal Garden Hotel in Kensington announced they had cancelled the dinner at which 450 guests were expected; then the Central Hall, where Begin was to have addressed a mass rally, followed suit.

They reacted after receiving anonymous calls threatening to kill Begin and blow up the hotel. After several synagogues refused to rent their halls for a meeting, Begin did not curtail his visit and a last minute dinner was organized at a kosher restaurant where left-wing Zionists held placards reading: "Begin, enemy of Zion" and "Begin go home!"

QUOTA RULING UPSET BY ELECTION

The elected Jewish representative on the Metropolitan Montreal School Board collided head-on with a government ruling calling for a quota on the number of Jews allowed to sit on the English-speaking school board. Ontario raises palliative care costs

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Ontario government's budget cutbacks to health care have struck one of the most vulnerable groups of patients — those waiting to be transferred from acute care hospitals to chronic or long-term care institutions or to palliative care.

Since 1979, institutions have been allowed to charge people in that situation $26 per day, but doctors were able to have that cost waived for 60 days.

New rules beginning Jan. 1, how-ever, raised the rates over 54 percent to $40.29 per day, or $1,225.62 monthly, and doctors could no longer waive the charge.

Most vulnerable patients hit

Ministry of Health information officer Lily Weedon told The CJN that this co-payment to OHIP rates is in response to hospital complaints that expensive acute care beds were being occupied by people who needed a lower level of care.

"Some patients, for instance, refused to go to the first place they were offered, but stayed in the hospital until they could get in where they wanted to go."

Mount Sinai Hospital, which has decided to delay implementation of the new charges pending a review of the situation, said that the hospital probably has about 20 people waiting for long-term care at any one time.

"They are staying longer than they used to," a hospital spokesperson said, "because of the cutbacks to chronic care. Of course," she added wryly, "they are waiting longer for everything else too."

To this statement Weedon replied that chronic care funding has been reduced at a far lower rate than that at acute care hospitals, two to four percent, as compared to cuts as high as 15 percent.

"The whole hospital sector has been cut by $1.3 billion over three years — this is year two."

Besides, she said, the money is not going to the ministry or the government, but is staying with the hospitals. "The hospitals don't have to charge the co-payment," she said.

Dr. Larry Librach, director of Mt. Sinai's palliative care unit, slammed the new charges for "penalizing people who are old and sick and can't go home, and those with the least ability to pay.

"It is adding another burden to those who are sick."

Moishe Greengarten, vice-president of public and community affairs for Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, which is charging the co-payment, is concerned that there is no differentiation in funding levels between

Jewish groups: wait and see

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) and the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care are taking a wait-and-see approach to the Ontario government's massive reforms of social and community health services.

For JF&CS director Gordon Wolfe, the best part of the new plan, announced last week by community and social services minister Janet Ecker, is that from now on, the province will assume full funding of all Children's Aid Societies.

The funding formula used to be 80 percent from the province and 20 percent from the municipality.

Wolfe said he's "delighted" at the new formula because it "legitimizes" funding of the JF&CS office in Thornhill. Under the old formula, there was uncase over the funding of operations in York Region because some money came from Metro, he said.

Obligation to help is uncompromising

A sword of snow and ice cut a frigid swath across the country for most of last week. The wind chilled temperatures well below the point of freezing. The cold was painful and dangerous. Skin froze after merely a few seconds of exposure. Lungs labored in the exchange of air and frozen moisture.

It was winter in the deepest sense of the word, the kind one feels in the bones, an assault of nature's inhumane and mercilessly testing elements.

It was winter that Canadians know and understand, and have always conquered. It was winter that Canadians describe in poetry, sing in song and paint on canvas. In doing so, we have always found our strength and our generosity, and forged aspects of our national character.

But it was also winter in which imagining a homeless person walking the streets day or night, was to imagine a homeless person facing certain death.

It was winter, therefore, which forced us to reflect upon our individual responsibilities to the most vulnerable and the most needy among us.

In this reflection, Judaism offers a way to see.

Our sages were determined to inculcate the central teaching that true service to God requires service to one's fellow man.

The most effective, most long-lasting and most dignified method of serving man is through the structure of community. It stands to reason, therefore, we must all actively participate in the life of the community. It is not surprising to read then, in the sayings of the fathers, "We must not separate from the community."

Among the very first utterances in the order of daily morning prayers is a rather prosaic "prescription" for personal interaction, one human to another, which was intended to enhance the quality of collective life: for example, honoring one's parents, education, hospitality to guests, visiting the sick, providing for a bride, accompanying the dead to their final rest, prayer and helping to restore peaceful relations between feuding individuals.

Our sages always made certain to translate the teachings of the Torah and the ideals of the prophets into practical, day to day institutions of communal life.

The late, philosopher/rabbinic scholar Morris Adler described the organization of those institutions thus: "In Rabbinic times a hostel was attached to each synagogue, so that no wayfarer need remain without shelter. From the synagogue, honored and trusted collectors went forth weekly to solicit contributions for the support of the needy.

"The poor of each town would receive aid every Friday, sufficient for a full week for themselves and their families. Clothing was distributed to the needy. Orphans were supported out of community funds.

"The community provided a dowry for poor or fatherless maidens. Free burial for the penniless was part of each community's responsibility.

"The obligation to participate in the various endeavors for the needy rested, say the Rabbis, even upon an individual who was himself the recipient of public charity."

Jewish Awareness Month begins

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The second annual city-wide Jewish Awareness Month (JAM) kicked off this past weekend for Jewish students of Ryerson Polytechnic University, Seneca College, the University of Toronto and York University.

University students on some other Canadian campuses are also planning JAM programs, albeit in most cases on a smaller scale, reflecting their smaller Jewish student populations.

The JAM project was inaugurated two years ago by Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life, the international umbrella body for Jewish campus organizations based in Washington, D.C.

City-wide Toronto programs this past weekend included a dance at the Big Bop, a downtown club, and a Tu b'Shvat seder featuring songs, stories and discussion about Judaism, nature, environmental issues and Israel.

"Almost all of the programming during the month runs under the banner of JAM," said Rabbi Michael Skobac, director of Jewish educational programming for Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto and coordinator of Jewish Awareness Month.

Israel Day at U of T is an annual event which now falls under the JAM umbrella. The other local campuses also have individual programming.

Other events include a number of environment-related programs to coincide with "Green Week," a Sunday Discovery seminar at York University, a downtown weekend retreat with an independent, U.S.-based grassroots student group called Lights in Action to focus on the theme of pluralism within the Jewish community.

Donations to a JAM kosher food drive will go to the Pride of Israel Synagogue Food Bank. A related event is York's peanut butter-and-jam sandwich making day, with sandwiches being given to a local Out of the Cold program for the homeless.

The month will wind up Feb. 15 with a "Fire and Ice" program – havdalah followed by roller-blading.

In Hamilton, plans for JAM week include a Purim food drive and a week of Israel-related programming, said Sheila Freedman, Jewish Students Association adviser.

In London, Ont., although there will be no Jewish Awareness month per se, there will be an Israel Day at the University of Western Ontario in mid-February, as well as programs on Bioethics and Hate Crimes on Campus. McMaster University in Hamilton is planning a JAM week for the week of March 24.

Ottawa's JSU-Hillel will "most likely" run a Shabbaton and invite guest speakers for February or March, said Stacia Benovitch, director of the organization which serves both Carleton University and the University of Ottawa.

McGill University in Montreal has tentative plans for a Jewish Awareness Month in March, and the University of Saskatchewan in Saskatoon may have a Jewish Awareness day.

Deportation cases against alleged war criminals on track

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Federal Court of Appeal has unanimously reversed a lower court decision, opening the way for resumption of immigration procedures against three alleged Nazi war criminals. But the decision does not mean the three men will face a hearing any time soon.

It is expected the three will seek leave of the Supreme Court of Canada to appeal the decision, a process that could take several months. In addition, various preliminary matters such as a request for disclosure and for directions of the court on procedural matters, must still be addressed before the allegations against the men can be heard.

Still, the decision by justices Louis Pratte, Louis Marceau and Arthur Stone removed a stumbling block from government efforts to bring the alleged Nazi war criminals to justice. And they did so using tough judicial language, with one justice pointedly criticizing the delaying tactics of lawyers for the three men.

Federal authorities allege that Helmut Oberlander, Erichs Tobiass and Johann Dueck misrepresented their wartime activities, including the murder of civilians, when they obtained Canadian citizenship.

Despite the seriousness of the allegations, proceedings against the alleged war criminals came to a halt when lawyers for the three men obtained a stay order on July 4, 1996. Federal Court Judge Bud Cullen ruled that "egregious pressure" was brought to bear on Associate Chief Justice James Jerome following a March 1, 1996 meeting and letters between Assistant Deputy Attorney General Ted Thompson and Federal Court Chief Justice Julius Isaac. Isaac subsequently met with Jerome, the presiding judge in the case, leading to the appearance of interference in judicial independence.

That wrong could only be cured by staying the cases, Cullen ruled.

The appeal court disagreed. Marceau said the facts "do not support the view there was a breach of judicial independence; and even assuming that they could have left [that] impression, the entering of a stay of the three proceedings to make up for the problem was not a suitable and warranted remedy."

No evidence of any conspiracy

Marceau said there was no evidence that Thompson approached Isaac to impose the government's view on the court. In addition, there is no evidence of any conspiracy or of bad faith by any of the parties.

Turning to Isaac's conduct, Marceau wrote that "a chief justice cannot entirely disinterest himself from the pace of progress and the timeliness of disposition of the cases the court has to deal with. He or she has a responsibility to ensure the court provides 'timely justice.' Indeed, it is his or her duty to take an active and supervisory role in this respect."

Because of the "quite unusual delay" in dealing with preliminary motions in the cases, it was proper for Isaac to fulfil his mandate "to ensure 'timely justice' and thereby avoid a possible embarrassment for the [court]...The intervention of the chief justice...did not constitute an interference with judicial independence of the presiding judge: it was not made in favor of one party to the detriment of the other and could in no way, affect the impartiality of the presiding judge."

However, even if an impartial observer reached a different conclusion, a stay would not be an appropriate remedy since it "obviates any chance for an assessment of the charges on the merits" and cannot "be viewed as being in the interests of justice," Marceau wrote. Any other judge of the court could have heard the case, he added.

An even stronger, if brief, judgment was delivered by Pratte, who, in reversing Cullen's decision, said "no reasonable person would ever ascribe to [Jerome] and all his colleagues the dishonesty and pusillanimity implied by this finding."

He disagreed with Cullen about the pace of proceedings, saying "the pace...had been so slow as to certainly give rise to a suspicion that justice was not rendered with reasonable diligence. In nearly a year, the references had made no real progress...Once the chief justice had learned of that situation, irrespective of the circumstances in which the information had been conveyed to him, he was duty bound to intervene even though his intervention might frustrate the [three men's] attempts to put off the hearing of the references for as long as they could. Their interest in delaying the proceedings was not a legitimate interest worthy of protection. All parties were entitled to insist that justice be administered with diligence; none could claim a right to delayed justice. The order made by [Cullen] was, therefore, as unwarranted as his indignation with [Isaac's] behavior."

The Appeal Court's decision was welcomed by several Jewish organizations that have pressed for speedier disposition of the cases.

"The decision will help ensure that people allegedly involved in mass murder won't walk free solely on the basis of government efforts to expedite hearing dates," said Irving Abella, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' war crimes committee. "What is most regrettable is the inordinate delay in these cases and the furthering of that delay by the unwarranted decision of the lower court [Cullen] to stay the cases."

"We are overjoyed to see the court return to the central issue in these cases rather than getting mired in dubious technicalities," said Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre. "All too often, we forget that these men were allegedly involved in crimes that exceeded in numbers and cruelty all the serial murders ever committed in Canada and the United States."

"The delaying tactics by defence lawyers have prevented the court from hearing substantive matters of these cases despite the fact that they began in 1995," said Lyle Smordin, president of B'nai Brith Canada. "It is hoped the Supreme Court will not grant an appeal if an application is filed by defence attorneys. [That] would delay the process...The courts must balance the enormity of these heinous crimes versus a minor transgression by judicial officials."

Relationship with God explored

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jews' relationship with God can be understood in two different ways, says Rabbi Lawrence Kushner, author and spiritual leader of Congregation Beth El in Sudbury, Mass.

"Some think of God as a giant circle up there, and themselves as a little circle down here. Others see God as a big circle as well, but they see themselves as a little circle within the big circle. They see God as the ocean and themselves as the waves," he said.

Rabbi Kushner kicked off a recent two-day mini-course entitled Invisible Lines of Connection — Finding the Sacred in the Everyday, sponsored by Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

Topics included the Joys and Perils of Jewish Connection and Individual Spirituality Meets Communal Responsibility.

"The extent to which we become aware of God's presence within us is the extent to which we become spiritually fulfilled," Rabbi Kushner told the capacity crowd at Leah Posluns Theatre.

In the first model, he said, prayer is conversational but in the second, the goal of prayer is to gain awareness of the presence of the Divine. "The Kabbalistic way of thinking is that God is in everyone and everything."

Occasionally, the rabbi said, we get a glimpse of what was intended for us. Rather than accept these moments as coincidence, we should take them to realize that the Divine is present.

"There is coincidence, but suppose something is going on in the universe that pushes us and guides us? Most of the time we are not aware of it, but every now and then we become startled by the power it exerts...There is more to reality than meets the eye.

"This approach to ordinary life yields the fruit of meaning and beauty instead of a helter-skelter feeling. Our only choice in life is whether we will live in reverence. The name of the game is to find the presence of the Creator in everything and help others find it as well. That is our only choice."

Fromm told his services are no longer wanted

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Controversial teacher Paul Fromm has received notice that his employment with the Peel Board of Education will be terminated. However, Fromm said he would appeal the move and Peel director of education Harold Braithwaite declined to comment on Fromm's status, saying it was a confidential personnel matter. He conceded that Fromm was not teaching last Thursday.

Fromm is quoted as saying he expected a lawyer for the Ontario Secondary School Teachers Federation will represent him before the Peel board, which must confirm termination of his employment.

Fromm's latest run-in with education authorities came after B'nai Brith Canada informed the Peel Board he had attended several meetings involving organizations that "are white supremacist and anti-Semitic."

"We were alerted way back that Fromm was up to his old tricks," said Karen Mock, national director of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights.

Fromm probably used school time to travel to one such meeting in Vancouver last April. There is evidence that Fromm distributed flyers promoting Malcolm Ross' books at the meeting, which was held the night of a school day, Mock said. Ross is the former Moncton-area teacher who was removed from the classroom for writing several books and articles that are anti-Semitic.

In presenting materials to the Peel Board outlining Fromm's recent activities, B'nai Brith pointed out Fromm was reprimanded in 1992 and that the 1993 Cowan report found that Fromm was not committed to the board's policies respecting ethnocultural equity, multiculturalism and anti-racism. In addition, the Cowan report found his "presence as a teacher has an adverse effect on the school community."

Even though he was warned following the Cowan report not to associate with racists, ironically news of the board's intention to terminate his employment first appeared on Holocaust-denier Ernst Zundel's computer Web site.

Mock said "the Supreme Court of Canada ruling in the Ross case makes it very clear that parents and children of diverse races and national backgrounds don't have to tolerate the poisonous environment in a school from a teacher who wishes they were never there in the first place."

Among the most frequently expressed admonitions in the Torah is the one which compels us to treat "the stranger, the orphan and the widow" with care and compassion.

In the strongest and most imperative terms, we are commanded to pay heed to the needs of the poor and of the needy.

We see this biblical emphasis, for example, in the repetition of the verb in the injunctive phrases "patoach tiphtach," you must open your hand to the needy, and, "naton titen," you must give assistance.

Or, "If your fellow human being falters and his hand is outstretched to you, you shall help raise him up..."

There is no ambiguity.

The obligation to help those who are in need is uncompromising. It is incumbent upon us all. It is the moral, the just and the proper way to behave.

In a recent d'var Torah entitled What Kind of Society Do We Want?, Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, spiritual leader of Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto, noted: "Ultimately, for Judaism, social assistance is not rendered to others out of a sense of compassion, self-interest or 'there but for the grace of God go I.' Rather, it is based on an awareness that here is a person created b'tselem elokim, in the image of God, worthy of personal dignity and respect."

Next week, in this space, I shall record some thoughts upon the role of government in guiding us as individuals and as a community to fulfil our responsibilities to "the stranger, the orphan and the widow".

The daily barrage in Ontario last week announcing potentially far-reaching legislative changes, which buried Ontarians like stones under a torrent of hot lava, provides an appropriate background for those thoughts.

We like to keep it simple ... Outstanding businesses, international presence, future growth.

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There is now hope that Switzerland will get to the bottom of its Nazi-era banking record, says a Toronto lawyer.

Sergio Karas, who represents several Canadians with claims against Swiss banks, told a packed hall at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation last week that Switzerland is anxious to close this chapter in its history in part because it is especially sensitive about its image.

That image has been marred by allegations that Swiss banks kept assets belonging to Holocaust victims, laundered Nazi gold bullion for profit and helped leading Nazis funnel money to South America.

The episode "has been a disaster for Switzerland. For decades, they lived in a kind of Disneyworld. Now, their reputation and national pride have been tarnished. They are doing damage control," mainly to avoid scaring off investment, Karas said.

What's more, young Swiss are now wondering why their country was not swallowed by Nazi Germany during World War II: "They're now believing that their government paid a price for its neutrality," Karas said. "What was the quid pro quo?"

Karas said he holds out hope that an international commission of inquiry, headed by Paul Volcker, a respected former chair of the U.S. Federal Reserve, will resolve the question of dormant Holocaust-era assets in Swiss banks once and for all. The commission, which will employ forensic accountants, was widely hailed when it was announced last May by the World Jewish Congress and the Swiss Bankers Association.

As well, pressure is mounting from the United States. Almost every day, Republican Senator Alfonse D'Amato, whose powerful Senate Banking Committee is probing Swiss-Nazi wartime dealings, unearths more documents pointing to Swiss duplicity and which have deeply embarrassed the government in Berne.

A separate investigation by the U.S. State Department is proceeding. As well, a $20-billion (US) class action lawsuit has been launched in the United States against Swiss banks.

Karas said the Canadian government has been quiet on the issue.

European Jews deposited cash, gold and other valuables in Switzerland before and during the war because of the Swiss banks' legendary secrecy laws, Karas noted. In many cases, he said, secrecy proved to be a bane, because numbers and passwords to secret accounts died with the victims of the Holocaust.

However, Karas said he "cannot conceive" that "sophisticated" investors and business people did not pass on the existence of secret accounts to someone, somewhere. "A lot [of depositors] did make it a point to tell relatives," he said. Now, those relatives are entitled to answers, Karas said.

At war's end, Holocaust survivors were preoccupied with rebuilding their lives, not with finding old assets, he said. For years, he noted, the Swiss required death certificates to open dormant accounts. Concentration camps did not issue death certificates.

Worldwide, Jewish groups claim Swiss banks are holding up to $7 billion in assets and interest belonging to victims of the Holocaust.

Karas said that in 1962, Switzerland paid out $6 million on 1,000 claims. In September 1995, he said, the Swiss released a memo saying they found 893 dormant accounts worth $50 million (Cdn). A year later, the numbers were whittled down to 775 dormant accounts worth about $44 million.

Last month, the Swiss National Bank publicly acknowledged that it had profited from its dealings with Nazi Germany, to the tune of 20 million Swiss francs. But the bank denied that gold and cash from Jewish accounts were part of that total.

This month, Switzerland offered to use $30 million from unclaimed, war-era bank accounts to set up a fund for descendants of Holocaust victims. Later negotiations with the World Jewish Congress boosted the so-called superfund's value to $250 million (US).

Karas said he's opposed to a superfund "because the correct way is to determine who belongs to which account, and then you compensate the heirs of the victims."

Despite the bureaucratic maze and bitter recriminations, Karas is satisfied there "is a concerted effort to get to the bottom of this and resolve the issue." Swiss banks have already partially lifted some secrecy rules, he said.

But, he cautioned, claims have to be handled properly. He suggests claimants hire a local lawyer, and soon.

"This is our last kick at the can. They want to settle, and if we don't do it now, we'll never do it."

TORONTO — Henry Goodman, honorary president of Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS) and a community volunteer for more than 60 years, celebrates his 90th birthday on Jan. 29.

In honor of the milestone and in recognition of Goodman's communal service, JF&CS is establishing the Henry and Jenne Goodman Scholarship Fund. The fund will enable Crown wards in the care of JF&CS to pursue post-secondary education.

Goodman has also been involved in the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, the Association of Jewish Family and Children's Agencies and Holy Blossom Temple.

Anyone interested in acknowledging Goodman's birthday may contribute to the fund in his name by calling 416-638-7800, ext. 214.

A resting place

The vote last Thursday in the Knesset was overwhelming: 87 in favor of the Hebron redeployment; 17 opposed; one abstained; 15 were absent. The vote in cabinet the night before was less one-sided but no less decisive: 11 in favor; seven opposed. In both chambers, the debate was impassioned. Deeply-held principles and desperate pleading found their expression in scorching argument and raw emotion.

The agreement was especially wrenching for many who are religious and on the right wing and for the purists of the prime minister's own party for whom last week's territorial compromise and the others that will inevitably follow are anathema. Indeed, one cabinet minister, Ze'ev Begin, could not reconcile his conscience to Israel's new commitment. Thus, as the law required, once he voted against the government's policies, he resigned his portfolio.

The prime minister's initials on the accord demonstrate, however, that the restraint of power has led him to understand the responsibility of governing for the widest common good. It prompted one commentator habitually predisposed against the prime minister to write that "the decision by Netanyahu demanded courage," for he was trying to move to "the centre of the political map," toward "national consensus, away from ideology and fanaticism."

If the peace process is not to shred the fabric of Israeli society, "the centre of the political map" is precisely where the prime minister must be and "national consensus" the instrument with which his government must build the structure of their policies. There can be no denying this. The prime minister is wise to proceed on this basis. Writing approvingly of the government's decision to honor the Oslo accords, of the prime minister's demand for reciprocal loyalty to its requirements, and of the Hebron agreement, the Jerusalem Post editorialized that "the most important factor going into the final status talks is the degree of unity within Israel." It is significant therefore, that after the Knesset vote, a poll conducted for Yediot Ahronot showed that 67 percent of the people of Israel supported the agreement, as compared to 25 percent who were opposed.

But national consensus, while reflected in the policies of the government, actually stands or falls on the behavior of Israel's peace partner. Ironically, though quite appropriately, Yasser Arafat will determine, moreso than Benjamin Netanyahu, how far and how fast Israelis and Palestinians will become reconciled to each other.

Despite the setbacks, events in the Middle East are unfolding in a manner unimaginable only a decade ago. Political analyst Alouph Ben pointed this out last week in Ha'aretz : "On Jan. 15, 1991, Israeli citizens put on their gas masks and waited in sealed rooms for the scud missiles from Iraq. Six years later, on Jan. 15, 1997, a Likud prime minister signed the redeployment agreement in Hebron and undertook to continue evacuating the West Bank territories and hand them over to the Palestinians."

In the six years since scud-warning sirens wailed in Tel Aviv, a veritable revolution has occurred in the Middle East. "Handshakes" have given way to agreements, joint police patrols, joint projects and troop redeployments. But there is still a long journey to travel. It will not be measured in months or even in a short term of years. Rather, it is a road that generations must travel, dispelling only slowly and painfully, the distrust and the hatred that for so long enveloped their parents.

On that very long journey, "Hebron" is merely a resting place.

"The homogeneity of our destiny has suffered a long interruption, although scattered fragments of the Jewish people have everywhere undergone similar ills. It is only in our days that the marvels of communication have served to bring about mutual understanding and union between isolated groups."

Doubts about the gene

I wonder whether the report by Judy Siegel on the genetic link found amongst kohanim (CJN, Jan. 9) suffers from the same kind of bad reporting as recent findings on the discovery of an "anxiety" gene.

I would classify the reported discovery of a gene for "alcoholism," for "criminality," and for racially-linked "intelligence" in the same category of the absurd, along with Nazi theories on race.

Karl Skorecki et al appear to have relied too heavily on a small, selected population of self-declared kohanim, and The CJN article tells us nothing about the use of a control population or the statistical significance of the results. Surely after the 3,500 years since Aaron lived, the genes on the Y-chromosome of high priests would not have remained unchanged or undiluted in all of the kohanim examined in their study.

It appears to me that when responsible press reports on scientific work, their goal as always, should be to find the truth within the limits of the experimental designs, and not to distort it with exaggerated conclusions.

Kaplan's work should not be overlooked

Arnold Fradkin, formerly a counsel with the War Crimes Litigation Unit, should be commended for the two-part series putting into historical and legal perspective the Canadian government's shameful record on dealing with Nazi war criminals in Canada.

Along with Bill Hobson, former unit director, Fradkin is one of the very few government officials over the past 50 years, in the sordid history of Canada's disinterest in Nazi war criminals, who showed the necessary "fire in the belly" to root these Nazi mass murderers from our midst.

It is important, however, for the historical record, not to overlook the substantial work done in the extradition of one Nazi war criminal by Robert Kaplan who, as solicitor general in the early 1980s, attempted in vain to convince his cabinet colleagues to deal with this issue.

It was during his tenure as solicitor general that one of the most significant cases in the history of Nazi war criminals in North America — that of Albert Helmut Rauca — was completed. Rauca was accused of having been involved in the murder of over 11,000 Jewish men, women and children in a small town in Lithuania at the height of World War II. It was Kaplan who worked closely with the West German government in ensuring the extradition of Rauca in 1982 to Germany, where he died in jail awaiting trial.

While Canada's record in dealing with Nazi war criminals will always be a dark stain on our collective conscience, it is at the very least important to remember the few successes and hope that with the small window of opportunity left, some justice can still be rendered.

Looking for her brother

I would ask for your help in trying to resolve a very painful, humanitarian situation. It is part of the problem known in Israel for many years as the "affair of disappearance of Yemenite children" and deals with the disappearance of hundreds of children from their families during the years from 1948 to 1954.

This problem was not confined to any specific grouping, Yemenite or other. Hundreds of families are still searching for their lost children. My family is one of them.

There is no proof that those children are dead, but there is some evidence that they were sent to different parents in different countries.

My family's story started on June 18, 1948, the very day my mother gave birth to her first baby, a boy, in one of the hospitals in Haifa. When she was discharged from the hospital, the baby remained there for "further treatment." My late father went whenever he could to see the baby, but he managed to see him only once. On the other occasions he was told that the baby had been sent to another hospital for a blood transfusion.

On his last visit he was told that the baby had died. Either from shock or from naivete typical to new immigrants, my parents didn't ask to see the body or to arrange its burial. Since that time, my mother has lived all these years with the feeling that her baby didn't die. With all the evidence we have heard through the years, we have a very strong feeling that the baby may have been taken away, like hundreds of others, for adoption.

In the last few months, it has come to our knowledge that our brother is alive and living in Canada. This is the reason why I'm reaching out for your help to publish the story and, if possible, to bring to my brother's consciousness that we are looking for him and waiting for him to get in touch with us.

All we know about him is that he was born on June 18, 1948 and was adopted about two weeks later — at the beginning of July 1948. He was born with fair skin, blue eyes and ginger hair.

I hope you will be able to answer my request and make it possible for us to unite with our brother, and especially for my mother to reunite with her lost son.

Perspectives

A realistic compromise

By ABBA EBAN

The Oslo agreement emerges as one of the most astonishing documents in diplomatic history.

Reviled by its opponents, it forced its way into the centre of national policy through the sheer logic and realism of its principles. It could not have triumphed if the alternatives had not been exhausted first.

The alternative to Oslo would have been the renewal of an attempt to suppress Palestinian nationhood in a way that has become so anachronistic as to defy all the currents of contemporary political culture.

It would not be an exaggeration to conclude that the alternative to the Hebron accord and the Oslo agreement would, sooner rather than later, have been a war in which Israel would face a united Arab world.

That war would have been fought with weaponry of the new technological age. Israel would not have had an ally in a war which would result from a failure to implement a valid international agreement.

The United States would undoubtedly have done what would be necessary to assure Israel's survival in resistance to the assault, but the starting point of the American position would have been the duty to implement international agreements.

We are moving into an era in which the viability of an armed action is determined very largely by international legitimacy.

Despite the victories of Israeli diplomacy in its numerous struggles, the fact remains that Israel, under Labor or Likud governments, has never been able to retain permanent control over any territory in which its positions were not validated by international law – not even in tiny Taba, which the Shamir government renounced!

This predetermines the attitude of world opinion to the permanent annexation of the Golan, leaving only the West Bank and Gaza as situated in an area of legitimate doubt.

But even here, the commitments of previous Israeli governments, which were decisively sustained by domestic opinion, place the future in the hands of negotiators, not of those who were ever open to far-reaching changes of previous jurisdictions.

For Israel to have resisted the tide would have marked our nation as a laggard, clinging to old ideas and disused palliatives. The rule of one nation over another is the only proven impossibility of the modern age. Israel can influence the future, but cannot dictate it.

Benjamin Netanyahu deserves a less reluctant applause than he has so far received from his former critics. We are going forward by going back — back to the partition, but not to the boundaries which enabled Israel to achieve its first breakthrough to realism and lucidity.

Between 1947 and 1949, Israel celebrated its most dramatic transition, from unprecedented anguish to unexpected salvation. At one end, the Jewish people was besieged, solitary and more savagely assaulted than any other people in history. Within two years, Israel was an established sovereignty with open gates, wide recognition and an expanding circumference of friendships.

This was the result of its leaders' capacity to prefer a realistic compromise to a desperate overreaching of its powers.

The task today is, first of all, to recapture the positions which an intemperate Likud diplomacy endangered in the recent past.

When the last election took place, Israel had creative relations with Egypt, Jordan, the Palestinian Authority, Morocco, Tunisia, Oman and Qatar, a diminution of the Saudi-led boycott, and every opportunity of expanding its friendships in North Africa and the Gulf Region.

Reckless rhetoric and superfluous initiatives (Who remembers the tunnel at the end of the light?) arrested the momentum.

The lesson for Israel is that neighboring coexistence ensures greater security than distant cordiality.

One of the urgent tasks is to supersede an electoral system so fraught with inherent absurdity as to put a hopeful future out of reach.

Meanwhile, there is an undercurrent of tragedy. Was Yitzhak Rabin's death really necessary if his policies (which I supported long before he embraced them himself) proved inexorable in the end?

He is a lonely non-survivor of a malice-ridden incitement campaign. Netanyahu should rescind his own terrible sentence accusing Rabin of "personal responsibility" for Israel's losses.

Abba Eban is a former foreign minister.

Hebron only an appetizer for Arafat

By ELYAKIM HA'ETZNI

A man goes into a jewelry shop, picks out the finest diamond necklace and then turns to the shopkeeper with an ultimatum: He'll take the necklace — but only if it comes wrapped up in a million-dollar bill.

The shopkeeper doesn't call in the men in white coats. Instead, he begins bargaining over the "price." Finally he congratulates himself for having brought it down to half a million, together with the necklace.

Is he mad, or what?

The jewel that is Hebron would not have become the breaking point in Benjamin Netanyahu's relations with his voters if it hadn't been for the even larger issues that go down the drain with it. These issues are so large as to make Hebron just an appetizer to the full meal being served to Arafat by the ministers who raised their hands in the Hebron vote.

They are putting their state under an obligation to the United States to hand over in three instalments all of Judea and Samaria except the desert area, which comprises close to 40 percent of the whole, and the settlements, which Netanyahu earlier pledged not to expand.

The surrender of Hebron thus presages a Palestinian state, since the only thing that still stands between Arafat and his unilateral declaration of statehood is the possession of territory. All the other attributes he already has.

As long as Arafat is holed up in an "archipelago" of eight isolated towns surrounded by Israeli-controlled territory, a state is simply not practicable; but after the three IDF "redeployments," it will be Israel's settlements and "military locations" that remain as isolated islands. As Falastin's (Palestine's) day dawns, theirs will wane.

Small wonder, then, that close Netanyahu adviser David Bar-Illan has already floated the trial balloon of a (demilitarized) Palestinian state.

It is a generous Ramadan present indeed that Israel has given the PLO chairman: Hebron, wrapped up in almost all the inhabited parts of Judea and Samaria.

If this is the "new Likud," nothing could be more apt than Bar-Illan's conclusion that there is no longer any real difference between Likud and Labor.

The Likud's partition of the Land of Israel has shaken us like an earthquake, breaking up the ground under the National Camp and bringing the historic, 60-year ideological Revisionist-Herut camp to a dismal end.

When Likud MK Michael Eitan and seven other Likud MKs came to terms with MK Yossi Beilin regarding the "Beilin-Abu Mazen plan" — something they couldn't have done without the prime minister's tacit blessing — they started a fire which spells the spiritual extinction of Jabotinsky's "New Zionist" organization.

Only a speedy revolution coming from inside the party can now prevent those flames from consuming the Likud physically.

Although Hebron is just the boulder setting a devastating avalanche in motion, the Hebron deal, looked at in and of itself, is a disaster too.

Gone is the one and only measure that could have given the Jews some sort of security — freedom of operation for the IDF — and this after "Bloody September," in which Arafat's soldiers killed 16 Israelis.

Gone too is Netanyahu's famous condition of "reciprocity." The agreement contains no direct linkage making any further Israeli move conditional on Arafat's making good on a myriad of past, present and future violations.

Worse still, from now on the United States will be the arbiter regarding what constitutes a violation and whether Israel will be allowed to discontinue the "process" in reaction to any such breach.

Gone is Netanyahu's reluctance to be under the same roof as Arafat. For some time now, the premier has been bending over backwards to get Arafat to deign to meet with him.

Gone even is the Peres-Arafat concession that left all Israeli property in Hebron under Israeli control. Now, all unoccupied Jewish property goes to Arafat.

So where do we go from Hebron? Travellers on the Netanyahu train will notice that the destination has been changed, from the Land of Israel to Falastin.

Gradually, as the euphoria fades and the bitter truth emerges, some travellers at least will jump off in an attempt to force the fall of the government and new elections.

They will have nothing to lose. If the land is to be relinquished, better it should be done by Meretz and the (Israeli) Arabs.

They have much to gain. Netanyahu has no hope of being renominated as his party's candidate in the next elections. After Hebron, the transfer of almost all the habitable parts of Judea and Samaria to Arafat in three stages will mark the tombstone on his career.

In Labor, many will prefer "elections-now" to a unity government led, de facto, by Shimon Peres. Any candidate with some standing will have the same chance as the young man who came along in 1992, salvaged a broken party, beat Labor and became prime minister.

If electing Netanyahu was a mistake, well, it can be rectified by a replay of May 1996.

Netanyahu was a relative unknown before his meteoric leap into power. It is impossible to believe that half the nation cannot produce another candidate.

The writer, an attorney and former MK, lives in Kiryat Arba.

Opinions

Youth want answers, not evasions

In 1947, Estelle Sapir went to the Crédit Suisse Bank in Geneva and showed officials a deposit slip dated in August 1938, but the bankers, unmoved, would not give her access to the account — her father's, presumably — without his death certificate.

By Emil Fackenheim in Jerusalem

"I broke into tears," she says, "and I cried to him, 'You want me to get it from Hitler, from Himmler?' But it was no use."

"That was the experience of thousands of Jews," Time adds to its report, making this the lead story in its Nov. 4, 1996 issue.

It was not the first time Switzerland had acted as though, there was a Hitler, a Himmler, but not in particular for Jews. That first time was in 1938 when, to quote Holocaust scholar Michael Marrus, there was "an unusual collusion between German authorities in Berlin and the head of the Swiss police, Heinrich Rothmund."

German Jews needed passports to flee. Rothmund suggested a "J" be stamped in the Jewish documents. "Why didn't we think of it?" they must have thought in Berlin, and accepted the idea gratefully. Henceforth, this would discriminate between the Germans to admit into Switzerland, if they were holiday makers and "Aryans," and Germans to keep out of the country, if "non-Aryans" in flight for their lives.

To quote Marrus again, "Rothmund continued to wield authority over refugee matters during the war, claiming afterwards that such caution was absolutely necessary in view of the dangers that the Confederation faced."

And now, 60 years after Rothmund, and 50 after the Sapir bank incident, Swiss U.S. ambassador Carlo Jagmetti is on record as declaring that "from a human point of view, some real mistakes have been made [by the banks]"...that it was "unacceptable [for the banks] to ask for death certificates;" that these requests were "psychological errors." (Jerusalem Post, Oct. 31, 1996).

From the human point of view? Psychological errors? "Real mistakes?" They should have been nice to survivors and their heirs, traumatized as these poor creatures were? Not hurt their feelings, break regulations, give them charity? Even now, it seems, a major Swiss representative, speaking officially for his country, fails to recognize a moral, misdemeanor of 50 years ago, an offence against justice than which, for a banker, hardly any can be worse. Winston Churchill called for ridding the world of Hitler's shadow at a time when he was busy with the Fuehrer alive. With Hitler dead for half a century, his shadow still lives.

And not in Switzerland or Europe alone. Last month, Canada made news with two facts, one inspiring — her leadership against starvation and death in Africa — and one depressing — the news of hundreds of Nazis, even thousands, safe and sound, alive and unmolested in Canada. Did I say depressing? It is an outrage.

For Jews to demand justice — in Switzerland, Europe, Canada — is more than the exercise of a right, more than merely about money. It is a duty, a mitzvah, as if given on Sinai itself; it helps rid the world of Hitler's shadow.

There is no mitzvah without hope. The polls show that Israeli youth want to know what really happened with Hitler, Himmler and Jews. For the first generation, even the second and third, it was too traumatizing. "No more 'horror stories," some tell us. "They disturb our sleep and our theology." The young will have none of that: the truth, if you please, the unvarnished truth! That's what the young want from the middle-aged and the old.

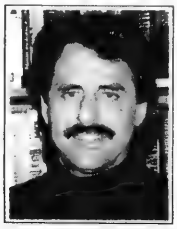
And not only in Israel. The polls show the same about Holland. The story of Anne Frank and her Dutch friends: How come so many Jews were deported from Holland? (Few returned.) Why have we heard about Anne, but not the Dutch Nazi party? There is hope also for the rest of Europe, perhaps even for France and Switzerland. And the Germans have published Ein Volk von Moerdern? The book asks only the question, but the answers wanted by the young are not evasions or apologetics.

In Canada they won't be left behind. Their grandfathers fought and died in the war. With the bloodshed over, how did the worst among the just-defeated enemy — not merely Nazis but Nazi criminals — get into Canada?

The young need hope, but they haven't had much in this century of hopelessness. Perhaps, with its main product, cause and symbol at last gotten rid of — Hitler, of course, who else? — the young will learn how to hope again, in another, better century.

'Ein brera' won't work in 1997

Thank God the Arabs hate us again. Praise the heavens we are isolated once more. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu promised us above all security, and he has delivered. We are once again secure in the notion that there is anti-Semitism. We are once again on firm ground in the belief that the Arabs just want to slit Jewish throats. We are strong in our conviction that the world is unjust and unfair to Israel and the Jewish people.



By Martin Himel in Herzliya

We can all breathe a very deep spiritual sigh of relief. Netanyahu's flawless foreign policy has created a Jewish Renaissance. In just nine months, he has returned us to our hallowed position of being a "Chosen People." We have been Chosen to have the Land, Chosen to have Hebron, Chosen to suffer, Chosen to fight, Chosen to live in the Jewish Mideast ghetto.

Even when he is "arm twisted" into a peace accord with the Palestinians, the prime minister is so embarrassed by the agreement that he initials it away from the cameras; he has a junior official sign it, and he defends his about-face with "I did the best I could with an inherited bad deal." God forbid it may improve relations with the Palestinians or the Arab world.

In less than a year, Netanyahu has done what no psychiatrist can do for a serious Jewish nervous breakdown. Last year, Israelis were suffering from the horrible notion that Persian Gulf and North African Arab states were about to establish business and diplomatic ties. After India, China and Oman, how could Israel cope with Qatar, Tunisia having representation and Gulf Air landing at Ben-Gurion Airport. And that was nothing compared to a Jordanian monarch, Saudi princes, an Egyptian president and others in Jerusalem paying what was until then inconceivable respect to a slain Jewish prime minister. That was all too much, all too frightening.

But what was even more terrifying was that Israel was becoming a "nation like all nations" in the Mideast. When buses blew up in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, it was not Egypt or the PLO or the Jordanians, or even the Syrians, who were responsible as usual. It was something too horrible to contemplate; it was the same Islamic terror that was plaguing those nations. Who were we to blame? How could Israelis point a finger at those Arab states, when they came to attend a summit in Sharm al Sheikh, Israel, to establish a united front against Mideast terror?

But Netanyahu has eased our fears of a complex, contradictory world promising "peace with security." The Palestinians, the Egyptians, the Jordanians are once again — thank God — hostile, unfriendly, dangerous. Thank God they won't attend more funerals in Jerusalem.

And with just a little luck, they will put us back in that reassuring position of digging up more burial plots on Mt. Herzl for fallen soldiers. Ah, but that could become a big catch for Netanyahu.

He's trying hard after that embarrassing Hebron accord. In an interview with Le Figaro, Netanyahu has already said there will be no compromise on the Golan in potential talks with Syria. Not surprisingly, the Syrians said, "What is the point of talking?"

Now there is talk of the Syrians launching a limited offensive in the spring or summer. They will of course blame the war on the "brazen lie" that Israel doesn't want peace. Once again, Jewish boys will have to face ein brera (no choice) but to die for the country. Only this time, many of those boys won't buy that "plate of lockshen."

They saw peace at hand. They saw it slip away. They are Israel's "MTV generation." They like the pubs. They like flirting on the beach. They don't want — they demand —hopes, dreams, life, like anywhere else. "There is no choice" won't fly in 1997.

When the ceasefire is announced, when the guns fall silent, when the graves are filled with 500 or 1,000 new tenants, that is when this country will experience a social and emotional backlash that hasn't been seen here before.

I just hope and pray that that "backlash" happens before the artillery starts firing, the blood spilling, and the emergency funds are filled up in synagogues in Canada and elsewhere.

Out of the cold

The scenario seemed simple and the challenge quite clear: in Toronto, the number of poor people has visibly increased. Panhandling is up; musicians are found in many subway stations; the social agencies report an increase in the workload; and if you walk out late at night, you will find people in doorways or on grates to obtain some warmth.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

So, what are we doing about it? We give to charities or perhaps soothe our conscience by bemoaning social injustice in general. But a number of religious institutions have gone beyond that, and now Holy Blossom Temple has become the first synagogue to join a very special effort.

Called Out of the Cold, it is a program to house some homeless people at least once a week and to give them not only food but also shelter. Religious edifices are, with rare exceptions, empty at night, and a number of institutions have resolved to make them available as shelters — at least part time.

Doing this has energized a remarkable number of volunteers, led at temple by Freda Muscovitch. Every Thursday night during the winter months, the doors will be open for some 70 people who come to eat. About half of them will be able to stay the night, have breakfast the following morning and then leave. Preparations have been going on for a long time to make sure that the program works, and that there is ample security on the premises and assitance for those who have special needs. People have contributed their funds and, even better, have given of themselves by being there.

Thirty-three churches were already in the program, which is 10 years old, and now Holy Blossom Temple has joined, supported, I am happy to say, by other organizations that have given financial support: Temple Sinai, Beth Tzedec, First Narayever Congregation, Downtown Reform Minyan, National Council of Jewish Women and the student organizations of Toronto universities.

The whole program is responding to a religious challenge. We read it at its most stirring on Yom Kippur morning when the words of the prophet Isaiah prick our consciences. Speaking of the ethical core of Judaism, he urges us "to share your bread with the hungry, and to bring the homeless poor into your house."

Yes, there have been some objections. I was at a public meeting when they were voiced loudly and sometimes angrily. Behind the questions directed to the organizers was a palpable fear that homeless people somehow represented a danger to everyone.

A local police officer assigned to the program reminded the questioners that the homeless were already in the neighborhood, sleeping under the Bathurst Street bridge or under stairways in apartment buildings.

Now that Out of the Cold has started, fears are slowly being allayed and the hungry who come are being fed and sheltered. But best of all, it has given a lot of our people an opportunity to practise their Judaism in a real and satisfying fashion: a hands-on way of doing things for others.

The Kirshner File

Switzerland struggles with its past

Switzerland, a nation hitherto known for its probity, is fighting to preserve its image in the face of plausible reports that it profited from World War II at the expense of Jews.

By Sheldon Kirshner

In the past two years, a series of increasingly shocking revelations have revealed that Swiss banks not only accepted plundered Nazi loot and sustained Germany's war effort, but often prevented relatives of Holocaust victims from gaining access to their accounts.

These developments have forced Switzerland to come to terms with its past, an agonizing process which may well shed further light on Switzerland's controversial policy toward Jewish refugees during the war.

The world is watching. "We are fully aware that nothing less than our reputation as an honorable country...is at stake," acknowledged Thomas Borer last month. He heads a Swiss task force coordinating the work of several panels, domestic and international, which have been charged with establishing the unvarnished facts with respect to unclaimed Jewish assets and Switzerland's financial relationship with Nazi Germany.

It is far from clear whether the whole truth can ever be ascertained. The issue of unclaimed assets is a case in point. The World Jewish Congress maintains that Swiss banks hold $7 billion (US) in funds and interest belonging to Jews. Swiss bankers, however, have put the figure at $32 million, a sum based on a 1996 probe which uncovered 775 dormant Jewish accounts.

The affair abounds in bitter irony. The Swiss legislation which enshrined the concept of bank secrecy benefited European Jews seeking a safe haven for their money. But these very laws were later a major obstacle in the recovery of such funds. In its most grotesque form, Swiss bankers asked for death certificates for account holders who had perished in concentration camps or ghettos. Since there was no proof of death, assets remained frozen in dormant accounts and/or deposit boxes.

Yet Switzerland was not totally delinquent in its dealings with Jewish depositors. After the war, Swiss banks doled out about $5 million (US) to Holocaust survivors who had accounts in Swiss banks. But these payments were like a drop in the ocean, prompting Jewish individuals and groups to seek redress.

The World Jewish Congress, backed by the chair of the U.S. Senate Banking Committee, Senator Alfonse D'Amato, has been in the forefront of this campaign. It has called for the creation of a $250 million (US) interim compensation fund. Earlier this month, the Swiss government agreed in principle to set one up, but details have yet to be ironed out.

External pressure was doubtless at the root of Switzerland's decision. On Dec. 31, the country's retiring president, Jean-Pascal Delamuraz, described the World Jewish Congress demand as "nothing less than extortion and blackmail," and argued that it would be interpreted as "an admission of guilt."

Scandalized by his stance, the World Jewish Restitution Organization characterized his remarks as "bordering on anti-Semitism," and threatened to launch a boycott of Swiss banks.

As a result, Swiss bank shares fell in stock market trading, and the Swiss government announced a readiness to establish a compensation fund.

Yet the matter is hardly settled, given the succession of recent reports which have cast doubt on Switzerland's integrity, a pattern of misconduct which is currently under scrutiny by Swiss and foreign fact finding commissions .

Among the allegations:

• Germany sold stolen gold to Switzerland to finance the war, some of it having been melted down from the teeth of Jewish corpses. The Swiss National Bank recently acknowledged that these transactions were profitable, but denies that the gold was taken from Jews in concentration camps.

Still to be determined is what proportion of the gold, said to be worth about $6 billion (US) at today's rates, was returned to its rightful owners. The British Foreign Office claims that only 10 percent was given back.

• Switzerland used unclaimed Jewish accounts to settle disputes with Swiss businessmen whose assets had been nationalized by Communist regimes in Hungary, Poland and, possibly, the former Czechoslovakia.

• Six million dollars in savings, deposited by Jews in the Swiss Bank Corporation before 1941, have disappeared.

• Adolf Hitler concealed royalties from Mein Kampf in the Union Bank of Switzerland.

On Sept. 2, 1939, Switzerland — sandwiched uncomfortably between Axis powers Germany and Italy — mobilized its army. The Swiss feared an attack from Germany and made preparations.

Swiss placated Germans

Swiss leaders were not merely paranoic. In June 1940, several German aircraft violated Swiss air space and were shot down.

The consensus among historians is that Hitler never intended to invade Switzerland. To the Germans, Switzerland — the world's banking capital — was more valuable as a neutral than as an occupied vassal state.

Switzerland, by treaty, allowed the transportation of material between Germany and Italy. Swiss trains carried coal, steel and agricultural products to the two Axis behemoths. Switzerland also supplied Germany with munitions and electrical power.

And, of course, Germany converted plundered gold into Swiss francs so as to purchase fuel and other raw materials to prosecute the war. Jean-Pierre Roth, vice-president of the Swiss National Bank, has said that Switzerland traded and cooperated with Germany to placate the Nazis.

It seems like a reasonable explanation. But European civilians and Allied armies paid an exceedingly heavy price for this calculated policy. By one estimate, the war might have ended at least a year earlier had Switzerland and other neutrals, such as Spain and Portugal, not helped Germany. Millions of lives could have been saved, including that of some 45,000 Jewish refugees who were refused admittance into Switzerland.

Concerned with being swamped by a Niagara of Jewish refugees, Switzerland adopted a callous position toward these pariahs. At Switzerland's insistence, the passports of German Jews were stamped with the letter J, thereby enabling Swiss border guards to turn them back. Furthermore, persons who had become refugees solely on "racial grounds" (Jews) were denied the status of political refugees.

The Swiss authorities did admit about 25,000 Jews. But many more were turned away and thus condemned to death, a bureaucratic crime which must weigh heavily on Switzerland's conscience.

Prejudice, bias and attitudes adjusted daily at the Ontario Science Centre.

Truth in science. Truth in medicine. Truth in philosophy.

And what is revealed about truth is that it isn't.

What each of us takes to be truth is affected by our points of view, shaped by our biases and coloured by our prejudices.

That's not to say truth is wrong or right. Only that truth is many.

Cultures we often call primitive achieved feats of engineering and architecture we can't explain or duplicate, based on truths we may never know.

In the South Sea Islands, navigators sailed, and still sail, thousands of kilometres across the ocean without maps or instruments, guided only by the truth that the islands they were navigating among actually move to meet them.

Prejudice and bias are only human. What they can lead to, however, oppression and discrimination, is inhuman.

At this confrontational exhibit we'll challenge you with our own biases. But we'll also give you an opportunity to react. At several points throughout the exhibit, you'll have the chance to express your take on the truth.

A Question of Truth now at the Ontario Science Centre.

That much we know is true.

Rabbinic Reflections

A good livelihood

By RABBI MOSHE JABLON

Parnassah, the Hebrew word for livelihood, is one of those terms which have entered the non-Jewish vocabulary. One of my congregants told me that he personally had never heard this term until he was negotiating with an Oriental businessman who said to him: "Albert, give me some merchandise; I need the parnassah."

We have always taken the need for parnassah very seriously. In the Ethics of the Fathers, we read, "With no food [i.e. parnassah], there's no Torah. On Saturday night at the conclusion of Shabbat, we sing, "May our offspring and our wealth multiply like the sand."

In parshat Beshalach, we read of the manna — the heavenly food which fell each morning in the Jewish camp. The Israelites were instructed to gather a day's supply of manna and not to leave over any manna in their homes for the next day. On the Sabbath no manna fell, but a double portion was provided on Friday. The manna was their livelihood, a gift they earned without having to work.

The Torah gives a reason for this miracle: "Behold, I will rain bread from heaven for you, and the people shall go out and gather a certain portion each day, that I may test them, whether they may follow my Torah, or no." The manna put the Israelites on trial and the challenges they faced continue to challenge us in our pursuit of parnassah.

What were those tests? Rashi states that the Jews were being tested to determine whether they would observe the commandments associated with the manna, such as the laws that they should not leave over any provision until the morning and that they should not go out on the Sabbath to collect it. The contemporary pursuit of a livelihood challenges our integrity in a similar fashion. Can we maintain our honesty, our sensitivity to our workers, our respect for the Sabbath and holidays as we struggle to put corn flakes on the table and a car in the garage?

According to Rabbi Moshe ben Nachman, the intent of the manna was to instil faith in the heart of the Jew. They had no other food in the wilderness and were without any recourse to any sustenance except the manna that was completely novel to them. Each day's quantity came down on its day; there was no saving for the future. Their trial was whether they would walk after G-d to a place of no food, and they passed with flying colors.

The late '80s and '90s have been a financial challenge for many families. The expectations of the heady days of the '70s and early '80s had to be downsized. The manna experience, however, conditioned us to maintain trust in heaven, even when doing with less.

Finally, the ease with which the manna was collected left the Israelis with much spare time. Their greatest test was how they would utilize their leisure hours. Would it be in the pursuit of spiritual goals — study, charity and prayer — or in the pursuit of physical enjoyment and a good time? Though earning a livelihood is far more difficult today than it was in the desert, most people still have evenings and weekends at their disposal. How do we utilize this precious time?

May the A-Mighty grant his people a good livelihood, the wisdom and strength to earn it with integrity and faith, and the appreciation of the leisure time at our disposal.

Books

Genesis: A Living Conversation* by Bill Moyers (Doubleday, $42.95).

In The Beginning* by Karen Armstrong (Random House, $27.95).

It seems that everyone has suddenly discovered the biblical book of Genesis. In recent months a spate of books on the subject have appeared. There has been at the same time an extraordinary promotion on behalf of a 10-part TV series with Bill Moyers, in which he engages groups of scholars, writers and other intellectuals in hour-long discussions of the Bible's meaning and significance.

Already more than 100,000 copies of the special guide to the series have been distributed. Moyers is working on fertile soil. According to a recent study, there already are 900,000 Bible-study groups in the United States with 15 million to 20 million members. The Genesis project hopes to attract an even wider circle of participants.

The articulate participants in the TV series aren't concerned with the origin or age of the Genesis narratives, or with their truth or falsity. They accept the material as written and then try to extract meaning and insights from it for our own time. The familiar stories seem ripe for re-evaluation today since they include lurid episodes of rape, exile, jealousy, murder, greed and betrayal. Aptly, and with some justice, the dysfunctional families of the patriarchs are compared to the widespread moral breakdown and loss of family values in our own society.

The wide-ranging and stimulating exchange of views sometimes digress from the text as the animated discussants comment on their own personal problems: divorce, health, religious doubt, conversion and the use of drugs. There is also an inevitable tendency to impose 20th-century standards and the modern sensibility on material of a far different and less sophisticated age. Thus, Genesis is faulted for its ideas on women, cruelty, superstition, racism and so forth. Nevertheless, there is much provocative and lively dialogue and interpretation.

Jewish participants include Robert Alter, Norman Cohen, Rebecca Goldstein, Blu Greenberg, Faye Kellerman, Naomi Rosenblatt, Burton Visotsky and Avivah Zornberg.

It is fascinating to observe how the outlook and interpretation of the Jewish participants — making use of midrash and other traditional sources — differ substantially from that of the non-Jewish members of the group. This is especially evident when they defend Jacob — in the light of rabbinic and later interpretations — as the others call him villain and decry his dishonesty and moral lapses.

The text is enhanced with illustrations from the world of art, biographical sketches of the participants, a guide for additional reading and an epilogue by Moyer in which he writes: "Especially now, with America's many cultural groups flying off into fragments, the Bible can be a common ground for discussion. The message of Genesis is that God has a relationship with all of us." May the conversation continue.

* * *

Karen Armstrong, well-known for her best selling A History of God offers her perceptions and understanding of the major themes of Genesis. Her manner, brisk and succinct, is replete with seminal ideas. About Jacob and Esau she writes, "Jacob was a twin, and in various cultures twins have been a common symbol of the divided self. Jacob had fought with Esau in the womb. Esau was his alter ego, his polar opposite, the shadow self that, like all of us, Jacob carried within him and with whom he had to come to terms if he was to live a fruitful life."

This engaging, modern midrash includes as an appendix the book of Genesis for quick reference and study.

Jewish Life

Family heritage explored in Vilna

By PETER STENN AND LAURA METRICK STENN
Special to The CJN

We have recently returned from a trip to Vilna in Lithuania, a trip to explore our families' heritage and Jewish life, past, present and future, in that part of the world. We also wanted to get some perspective on our people's religious future.

Guest Voices

We found that Vilna is a beautiful city on the Wilja River. The charming old town is well-preserved and vibrant, with night life, students, narrow cobblestone streets and a fairytale-like atmosphere. But the Yiddish life is gone.

We started at the Jewish Centre on Pylimo Street. Although it was not open the Sunday we were there, a woman answered our knock. After a short search for a mutual language, we settled on our very primitive Yiddish, embellished by very sophisticated mime.

"Where is the synagogue?" we asked.

We were able to translate her reply: "A beautiful yellow building on the right side of the street, about two kilometres up the road." And though we had already walked by it without recognizing it as a synagogue, we then easily recognized the "beautiful yellow building."

Inside, the Orthodox synagogue was very comfortable, although it was worn. That it had been nurtured and loved by its congregation, that it had given spiritual solace, was evident. But also evident was its spartan poverty.

We returned that evening for services. It felt very religious and dignified, as a service should be. The congregation was in prayer; the chanting was poignant; the music and prayers were familiar. We could not understand the sermon, which was in Yiddish. People were dressed simply. The cold temperature made it necessary to wear our coats. Our overriding impression was of an aging congregation, since those in attendance were almost all seniors. Out of about 100 people, not more than a handful were middle-aged or younger, and most of them were visitors or temporary residents.

The next day, we went with a local Jewish guide and driver to visit Kalvarija, the remote ancestral village of one of our grandfathers about 100 km southwest of Vilna.

As we drove through the countryside, we could see that much of Lithuania is poor, agrarian country, just now recovering from the devastation of, first the Nazis, and then the long onerous occupation by the Soviets. Outside of Vilna, there are few cars. Much of the farm power is provided by horses. Hand labor is common.

Our ancestral village seemed very small and very quiet — from another era. Many of the people were earthy peasants. We stopped for our guide to ask about the only remaining evidence that Jews ever existed there: the cemetery and the synagogue.

The cemetery was weed-strewn and ragged. Headstones were askew, most damaged. While it had not been destroyed, it had clearly been neglected.

The synagogue was in ruin. We could clearly recognize the central bimah, the Aron HaKodesh and one Hebrew inscription that remained over the entrance arch ("Through these portals go..."). For some reason, we felt the most sadness when we saw the remnants of dignified blue-painted columns, and a piece of ceiling metal flapping in the wind through the almost totally open roof.

Our first impulse was to work with our guide to organize some way to restore this testimonial to Jewish life. We could raise funds. We could bring it back to its former glory or at least prevent its further decline.

But as reality began to set in, we asked who would see this synagogue. We were told that the nearest Jew lived 50 km away.

While we were familiar with Nazi atrocities and the impact of the Holocaust at an individual and family level, we had not previously been exposed to its devastation of a culture. It was a numbing experience.

We had expected, or perhaps hoped, to see some evidence of a Jewish rebirth in this part of the world, particularly after the Soviet era. There was little evidence of such rebirth. We saw few young Jewish people. We were told that most have emigrated either to North America or to Israel. The Jewish population shrinks with each passing year.

A significant portion of the congregation at High Holy Day services in Vilna is made up of North American and Israeli visitors, and the Jewish community seems to sustain itself in large measure through serving visiting Jews. For those of us to whom our heritage is important, preserving and visiting these sites is a priority. However, in terms of a Jewish rebirth, the Nazis' goal of Judenfrei seems to have largely been achieved in Lithuania.

SEPHARDI RITE AN OCCASION FOR STUDY AND PRAYER

Orna and Michael Serruya hold baby Aaron Nathaniel at his Talamon, a Sephardi rite held on the eve of the brit milah. A silk tapestry and two Torah covers grace the wall. Above them a fringed scarf drapes the actual talamon (canopy), under which the brit is performed. The talamon ceremony includes study and prayer for the well-being of mother and baby. Rabbi Raphael Abuhatzhira, inset, grandson of revered Sephardi rabbi Baba Sali, was brought in from Israel to co-officiate at the ceremony.

Diplomatically Speaking

BY Jehudi Kinar

Israel's population now over 5 million

At the beginning of every year we receive the most recent statistics. As the 50th anniversary of the establishment of the State of Israel approaches, we reflect on the size of her population, which in 1948 included about 600,000 Jews.

One of the most oft-quoted statistics on Israel relates regretfully to our roads. It has been mentioned before that more Israelis have been killed in traffic accidents than in wars. On the first day of 1997, four Israelis were killed, on top of the 594 who died in 1996, of whom 52 were children. At the same time, 3,414 Israelis were badly wounded. Let us hope that the Israeli authorities together with its population will find a way to win this war on the roads. We cannot afford any more victims.

More gratifying statistics concern the growing Israeli population. At the beginning of 1997 Israel counted 5.764 million inhabitants, of whom 4.656 million (80.8 per cent) were Jewish, 842,000 Muslims (14.6 per cent), 170,000 Christians (2.9 per cent) and 96,000 Druze (1.7 per cent). In the period January to December 1996 Israel's population increased by 145,000 souls, which means an increase of 2.6 per cent. As the number of Jews in the former Soviet Union is decreasing, the number of immigrants arriving from these countries is decreasing as well. While in 1995 we absorbed 75,000 immigrants, the number for 1996 was 69,000. Still 84 per cent of immigrants arriving in Israel are originally from the former Soviet Union (FSU). Since 1990, Israel absorbed more than 755,000 immigrants and nearly 628,000 of them came from the FSU. In 1996 Israel welcomed nearly 122,000 newborns.

When we note that the estimated Jewish population in the world today is 13 million, then we see that more than 35 per cent of them live in Israel. This is the case if we still estimate that the Jews in the United States and Canada amount together to more than six million, which translates into 47 per cent of the total Jewish population in the world.

These statistical facts were published by the Hadassah Institute in Jerusalem and the figures are somewhat surprising. I would have thought that the gap between the number of Jews in Israel and North America would be narrower by now; nevertheless, we can project that by the years 2005-2010 Israel will be the biggest Jewish centre in the world. The above statistics were compiled by Prof. Sergio DellaPergola, the head of the Division of Jewish Demography and Statistics at the Institute of Contemporary Jewry at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

The Jewish community in Toronto will have the opportunity to hear DellaPergola when he and two other faculty members from the Hebrew University, Prof. Yair Zakovitch and Dr. Ze'ev Mankowitz, will participate in an interactive evening on Jewish Identity in the New Millennium, Feb. 3, at York University. Moderator is Prof. Irving Abella.

DellaPergola was the first speaker at the spring session of an ongoing dialogue between the president of the State of Israel and representatives of the many Jewish communities around the world.

When we speak or write about the interaction between world Jewry and the State of Israel, it is important that we know facts and figures. There is no one more capable of describing the demographic facts than DellaPergola, whose topic at the evening on Jewish Identity organized by the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University will be What do Statistics Predict?

Scholarship in Holocaust studies begins at York

TORONTO — Eric Gertner, his brother Henry and sister Marlene Brickman, have recently given their parents, Berek and Regina Gertner, a 50th wedding anniversary present that will help York University students for years to come.

They have established the Berek and Regina Gertner Scholarship in Holocaust Studies, to be awarded annually to one or two students for Holocaust studies.

Over $15,000 has been donated by the Gertner family and their friends, says Michael Brown, director of York's Centre for Jewish Studies. Under a new program, the Ontario government will match any funds raised before March 1997. York was one of the first universities in Canada to establish a course on Holocaust studies.

Berek and Regina Gertner are survivors who originally came from southwestern Poland. Regina was sent to Auschwitz as a teenager, then marched by the Nazis to Czechoslovakia in 1944, where she was liberated by Russian troops in 1945. Berek was sent to labor camps, survived a bout of typhus, escaped with a group of boys in February 1945, and was eventually discovered by Russian soldiers.

"I tried to think of something that would be unique and contribute to the community," Eric Gertner said. "I thought of this idea and I discussed it with my brother and sister. We hope the Holocaust, which played such an important role in my parents' lives, will be better understood in the future."

Among the students present when Brown presented the Gertners with a framed certificate honoring the new award was third-year visual arts major Samara Enchin. A visit to concentration camps in Poland a few years ago left her with an interest in learning more about the Holocaust.

Eric Gertner says he and his siblings chose York as the recipient of the scholarship because all three are York graduates and Henry's son, Terry, is now a student there. In making their gift, they are seeking to ensure that future generations of students will be familiar with the catastrophe that has shaped much of modern Jewish history.

The Toronto Star has advised The CJN that, when contacted, prison official Joe Meko did indeed speak with its reporter.

Somalia inquiry's end concerns Jewish groups

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The decision by federal authorities to bring the Somalia inquiry to a close will prevent the commission from fully addressing the question of racism in the military, a lawyer for Canadian Jewish Congress stated last week.

"We're extremely disappointed that the commission will be closing down," said Keith Landy, who represented Congress at the inquiry. "With critical gaps in the testimony, it is unreasonable to expect that the commission's report will lift the veil of uncertainty hanging over the Canadian military or fully explore the root attitudes of racism which permeated the Airborne Regiment and precipitated the violence...

"Now we will never get at the full truth and many of the key questions, particularly ones involving the actions and views of senior military leaders on these issues, will remain forever unanswered. It is hard to imagine how an incomplete report by the commission will be able to help restore the tarnished image of Canada's military to its former illustrious standard or to assist in rooting out racism in its midst."

The Somalia Commission was struck to investigate incidents involving the Airborne Regiment in which Somalia youth were killed and others abused during its peacekeeping mission. The inquiry has uncovered evidence of a coverup by the military and in startling testimony by the Airborne's former discipline officer, Sgt. Maj. Bud Jardine, evidence that racism was tolerated. Under cross examination by Landy, Jardine testified he was aware soldiers sported swastika tattoos but he did not believe the tattoos were a racist symbol or undermined discipline.

"If you look at the pattern of the soldiers' behavior then see the attitude of the officers who failed to read the signals, it's no surprise Somalis were killed," Landy said at the time.

Although the Armed Forces has, since the Somalia incidents, drummed out three recruits for racist behavior, it's not clear that the culture that tolerated racism has been fully addressed, Landy said.

Last October, Congress urged Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and Defence Minister Doug Young to allow the commission to complete its work. "I can't help but ascribe a selfish motive [for shutting down the inquiry], that being the commission was to begin dealing with a period when the Liberals were in power," Landy added.

Marvin Kurz, who represented B'nai Brith Canada at the hearings, said "we're quite scandalized" by the decision to terminate the inquiry.

"We see no evidence of the government's intention to look at the structure of the military and make sure the problems [including Nazis in the armed forces and sending racists to Somalia] recur," Kurz said.

"The government's conduct during the inquiry has been far less than upfront, far less than what you would expect of a government that wants the truth of what happened to come out," he added.

ANGUISH TO HOPE

A Mission to Hungary, Poland & Israel

for Canadian University Students

In the summer of 1897...
Theodor Herzl, founder of the modern Zionist movement, predicted the creation of a Jewish homeland within fifty years. Half a century later, after the annihilation of one third of world Jewry by the Nazis, the state of Israel was reborn.

A century later...
In the spring of 1997, join one hundred Canadian university students as they travel to the birthplace of Theodor Herzl, witness the despair of eastern Europe's death camps, and the joy and promise of the land of Israel.

In Hungary visit Budapest, birthplace of Holocaust martyr Hannah Senesh, and home to the magnificent century and a half old Donahey Street Synagogue, attended by Theodor Herzl as a child. In Poland take part in the March of the Living from Auschwitz to Birkenau together with thousands of students from around the world. In Israel tour the length and breadth of this ancient yet modern country and celebrate Israel's Independence Day on the streets of Jerusalem.

Be a part of this historic and memorable journey into the past and future of the Jewish people.

A Canadian student, draped in the flag of Israel, views the haunting monument at the entrance to the Majdanek death camp in Poland.

Fee: $2,895 plus minimum contribution of $100 to local UJA/CJA/UIA campaign.
(Limited scholarships for applicants in genuine financial need may be available in some communities. $2,895 fee is applicable from all Canadian points of origin.)

UJA Federation Campaign Closing

A SALUTE TO SUCCESS

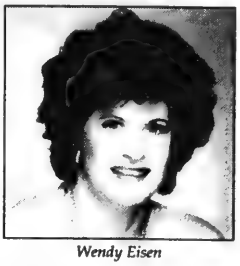
Belief in community was the spark that kept the fires burning all evening at the 1997 UJA Federation Campaign closing last night. The banquet, based on a summer camp theme, marked the official end of UJA Federation's annual campaign which has already raised more than $33 million. The final total is expected to exceed $35.5 million - about $1.5 million more than last year.

Neil Nisker

Campaign calls will continue to past contributors who have not yet given a gift and to potential new donors. This year's campaign concentrated more heavily than ever before on reaching new givers. More than 2,500 responded with contributions totalling over $800,000. Last night, hundreds of volunteers were saluted for their dedication and commitment to community.

In keeping with the evening's cozy camp theme, Beth Tzedec's elegant ballroom was transformed into a giant mess hall complete with campfire centre pieces, flagpoles and candy from the "tuck shop". Former UJA Federation Chairs Wendy Eisen and Neil Nisker, co-chaired the closing.

Special awards were handed out to volunteers for "Best All Around Campaigner," "Top Telethon Junkies," "Rookie Camp-aigner of the Year," "Best Husband and Wife Team," and "Best Divisional Program" among many others. Veteran campaigner David C. Green once again walked away with the award for "Most Cards Covered," and it was no surprise that UJA Federation's most successful one day fundraiser, Super Sunday, won for "Best Campaign Program."



Wendy Eisen

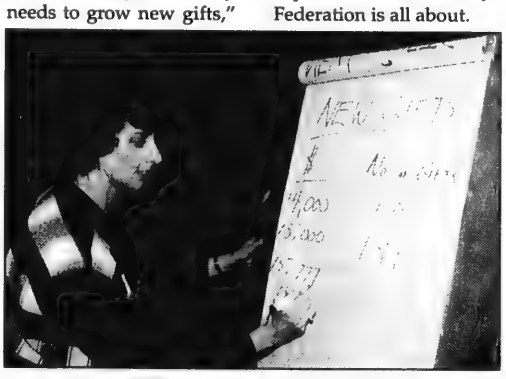
UJA Federation Campaign Chairman David Goldstein said he felt "blessed to have been part of such a successful campaign." Last night, Goldstein praised his Vice-Chairmen David Engel and Michael Daren and formally introduced his successor Leo Goldhar. "Working with such dedicated volunteers," said Goldstein, "deeply enriched my life."

UJA Campaign proud of new donors

UJA Federation Campaign '97 was distinguished by an unprecedented effort to reach community members who had never contributed before. Already more than 2,500 new gifts have been received and campaigners are continuing with more calls.

"A growing community needs to grow new gifts," explains Gary Grundman, who co-chaired the drive for first time contributors with Rosanne Ain.

The push to attract new donors involved hundreds of volunteers who were asked to focus their energies on contacting potential new givers and explain to them what UJA Federation is all about.



Agi Mandel tallies up pledges at a recent New Gifts telethon.

A series of new gifts telethons, including the first ever in York region at the Promenade Shopping Centre, and private parlour meetings helped raise awareness and several hundred thousand dollars.

"The response from the community was very gratifying," says Agi Mandel, 1997 Vice-Chair of UJA Federation's Women's Campaign. "We realized we were finally reaching people."

"The job was not easy and the volunteers should really be proud," notes Grundman. "But even more important than raising money is the fact that each pledge represents one more committed Jew."

Mission season begins with UJA Federation's Prime Minister's Mission to Moscow, St. Petersburg and Israel, March 23 to April 2.

At a cost of $3,900 per person, Prime Minister's Mission participants will stay in 5-star accommodations and travel with Dr. Baruch Gur, the architect of Operation Exodus. The VIP itinerary includes a tour of the Kremlin, visits to ancient synagogues and the famous St. Petersburg Hermitage. On the Israel itinerary are meetings with government leaders, a Golan Heights tour, Canada Centre in Metulla and other UJA Federation-sponsored projects. For more information, call Ronit Climan at (416) 631-5738 or Baruch Gur at (416) 631-5713.

Visit Israel in Style on UJA Federation's Fashion Division Mission, March 30 to April 8. The tailor-made itinerary features visits to some of Israel's most fashionable neighbourhoods plus a look at fashion industry business opportunities and immigrant absorption sites. The cost of the mission, which includes first-class hotels, is $2,400. For more information, call Jeff Springer at (416) 631-5706.

Israel will be a society of Societies in May, when members of Societies from many countries meet in Jerusalem. It's a major highlight of UJA Federation's Chazak Mission to Israel, May 5-20, for those who belong to a Society. Other attractions include Eilat and visits to Society-sponsored UJA Federation projects. The cost is $3,900 per person. More information is available from Marc Bookbinder at (416) 631-5703.

The tour is designed for all ages, with Galilee jeep excursions, inner-tubing down the Jordan River and a climb to the top of Masada, where bar and bat mitzvah ceremonies are being planned. The cost for a family of four (2 adults and 2 children) starts at $12,495. For more information call, Mark Freedman at (416) 631-5691.

Mission Sefarade joins Jewish past and present

UJA Federation is inviting the community to pass through the gateway between the Jewish and Arab worlds on its first mission to Morocco and Israel.

Mission Sefarade, May 20 - 30, offers an opportunity to experience the sights and sounds of some of the most magnificent cities in North Africa.

Although many Sefardi participants will be able to trace their roots as they visit the country's major centre, the mission is not restricted to Sephardim.

"This is a wonderful way for both Sefardi and Ashkenazi Jews to learn about one of the oldest Jewish communities in the world," says Eric Attias, a member of the mission's planning committee.

Attias, who was born in Morocco, says he is looking forward to seeing the "thriving and dynamic Jewish community in Casablanca and participating in the festive Hillula of Rabbi Shimon Bar Yochai." The Hillula commemorates the anniversary of Bar Yochai's death.

Israel highlights include visits to immigrant absorption sites, the kotel, tours of Yad Vashem and Yitzhak Rabin's grave on Mt. Herzl.

A special information session for the mission is being held Thursday, January 30 at 7:30 p.m. at the Lipa Green Building, 4600 Bathurst Street. For more information, please contact Avi Benlolo at (416) 631-5688.

Mukamal led Iraqi community

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Saleh Mukamal, a noted businessman who was active in communal affairs and founded the Iraqi Jewish Federation of Toronto died recently. He was 82.

Mukamal was born in Baghdad in 1914, part of a large family, many of whom were merchants. In the early 1940s, he moved to New York, where he brought most of his family.

He moved to Canada in the early 1960s, and became active in the real estate business, becoming president of Chelsea Homes.

Able to bridge the Sephardi and Ashkenazi cultures, Mukamal was both on the board of directors of Holy Blossom Temple and active in his own culture. He was national chair of the Canadian Jewish Congress committee for Jews in Arab lands and lectured extensively on Sephardi culture.

Judy Feld Carr, who preceded him as committee chair, enlisted his help for her work with Syrian Jews.

Saleh Mukamal

"He was with me to translate for me, helping pass messages and making deals [to arrange to get the Syrian Jews out]. If I needed him, he was there, even though there was no glory, no honor [for him]," Carr said. "I could trust him completely. Once the mission was done, he never spoke of it again, to me or to anyone else.

"We were friends for a long time. He was the most gentle, sweet, lovely person — one of the great people I've had the honor of knowing."

Bernice, his wife of 41 years, told The CJN that her husband was an avid Zionist. One of his great prides, she said, was that he was responsible for smuggling the first date shoots into Israel, which led to the flourishing date industry the country enjoys.

He was very proud of his Iraqi heritage, she said, and wanted to perpetuate customs as they were followed in Iraq.

"He was responsible for bringing an Iraqi sefer Torah from Westminister Synagogue in London to Holy Blossom. We took it to the Royal Ontario Museum; they restored it and now it is used for the High Holidays by Iraqis."

Zweig dedicated to community

Born Betty Salutin, in London, England, in 1906, she came to Canada with her family in 1911. Forced to leave school as a teenager to help support her family, Zweig entered the workforce and quickly became the private secretary to the president of Colliers magazine. She was fiercely proud of her Jewish heritage and was quick to speak out against the anti-Semitism she often encountered in the workplace.

She met Morris Zweig in the late 1920s and they were married in 1931. She took up the role of wife and mother and soon found a new channel for her energy and drive in charity work.

Zweig became involved with the Sinai Service Group in the early 1940s, raising funds for Mount Sinai Hospital in Toronto. Within a few years, she had become president of the organization — a pattern that would repeat itself in the many organizations with which she subsequently became involved.

In 1948, the Zweig family joined the Holy Blossom Temple, where she was involved with the sisterhood. It was at about this time, as well, that she became involved with Hadassah. Her dedictation to the cause so impressed the leadership of that organization that Zweig was asked to become chair of Israel Bonds, first for her Hatikvah chapter, then for Hadassah on a city-wide basis.

While maintaining the ties to her other charitable endeavors — and often adding new ones, like the Baycrest Geriatric Centre — selling Bonds became the most important cause in her life. She became the national vice-president of the Women's Division, State of Israel Bonds of Canada, and later was the first woman ever appointed honorary chairman of the board of governors of the State of Israel Bonds in Toronto.

Through her work with Israel Bonds, Zweig came to know and be known by a host of Hollywood celebrities as well as political leaders in both Canada and Israel. For her Bonds work, in 1972, she was presented with the rarely bestowed Eleanor Roosevelt Humanities Award.

By the 1980s, Baycrest became her primary focus. Long involved as a leader of the Women's Auxiliary of the Jewish Home for the Aged, she was named a life member of the board of directors. She continued to chair the gift shop well into her 80s.

Jewish organizations may face major overhaul

CJC president Goldie Hershon and other Congress officers did little to hide their anger over the CJF-Canada proposals, despite efforts by Vineberg before the meeting to reassure CJC and to tone down the rhetoric.

CJF-Canada has told CJC, which receives about $3 million in annual funding, that the proposals are intended to make the Jewish community more cost-efficient and to avoid "duplication" of activities in an era of increasing community austerity measures and "rationalization" of services.

But the speakers agreed that implementing the recommendations would usurp CJC's democratic and historic mandates, send out the worst possible signal during a precarious period in Quebec history, and allow those who control the purse strings to unilaterally carry the day.

"A few people making decisions in a back room is not the way I see this going," Hershon told the meeting. "I don't think it's fair and I don't think it's right."

Hershon said she's received an "outpouring of support" from members of the community supporting CJC's position.

CJC treasurer Zave Climan hoped a compromise with CJF-Canada could be found by enhancing CJC's "advocacy" role in Ottawa, including the possible relocation of some national staff if needed.

CJC officials vowed there would be no compromise on merger or an outright move of the national office out of Quebec.

For Frank Schlesinger, CJC's national secretary, a merger was untenable for one basic reason: CJC, in keeping with its mandate as Canadian Jewry's "parliament," elects its leaders, while federations appoint them.

As the Jewish community's advocacy body, "CJC has to deal with issues that can bring it in direct opposition with the government in order to defend Jewish and human rights," Schlesinger said.

"I'm not anti-federation," he said, "but their reality is different. CJC represents the will of the people. We cannot transfer the advocacy role to federations."

Those and similar sentiments were echoed in even stronger terms by other CJC leaders and members of the executive.

As a Children's Aid Society, JF&CS has about 75 children in its care, either as Crown wards, society wards or on a voluntary basis.

Ecker's announcement was part of a set of sweeping reforms to provincial spending. In the health and social services sector, many costs once assumed by the province will be transferred to cities and towns.

Queen's Park will institute the following changes:

• Municipalities will pay more for welfare. Funding will be split 50-50 with the province.

• Day care will be managed at the municipal level and costs will be shared 50-50 with the province.

• Management and funding of social housing will be transferred to municipalities.

• Municipalities will assume full funding of public health programs. The province will keep responsibility over disease control and immunization.

• Queen's Park will fully fund Children's Aid Societies and women's shelters.

• The province will create a new Long Term Care Agency to co-ordinate long term care reforms according to province-wide standards. Municipalities will assume half the funding for these services.

Wolfe said a "bad move" by the province is the transferring of costs for social assistance programs to municipalities.

Because rules will vary from city to city, those most in need will be treated differently depending on where they live, he said.

Wolfe said the provincial Tories were "politically clever" to transfer controversial programs like welfare and child care to municipalities, while at the same time, switching the funding of education from property taxes to provincial grants.

In the meantime, Wolfe says he wants to hear more about the province's plans before further comment.

The same view was expressed by Moishe Greengarten, vice-president for public and community affairs at Baycrest.

He said he expects the reforms to have "some" impact on long-term care but that it's too early to say how much.

Greengarten said the government's plans leave many "unanswered questions."

Cutbacks raise palliative care costs chronic care and palliative care.

Since palliative care is intended to be for those in the very last stages of a terminal illness, the 60-day waiver of fees was often enough to either save those patients from paying the co-payment altogether, or have them pay it for only a very short time, he explained.

Those under 18, those receiving family benefits or welfare, and those with monthly incomes below a certain level, are fully or partly exempt.

Librach, however, is concerned about situations where a couple is existing at a barely subsistence level, and the healthy spouse suddenly has to come up with the extra money. "You don't know what will happen if they can't pay."

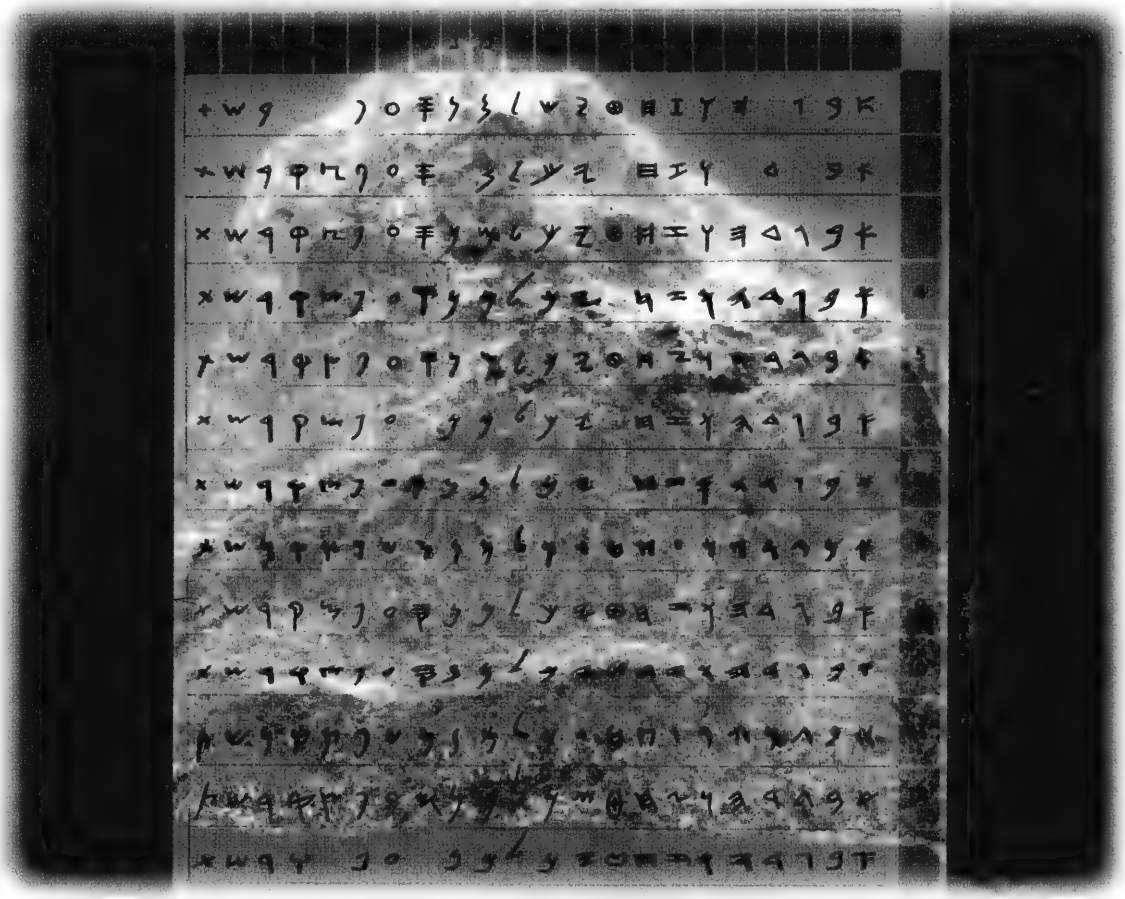
EDUCATION

THE TEACHER, THE PUPIL AND THE LESSON

On this cover of our education supplement we try to capture visually three of education's main components: the teacher, the pupil and the lesson. The painting by Lazar Krestin poignantly, even if idealistically, expresses the tenderness, respect and love of the teacher toward his pupil. In the pupil's eyes we see reflected the attentiveness and the curiosity that the teacher's encouragement has inspired. The lesson is embodied by the alephbet, whose development and historical context are traced on the chart reproduced from the Encyclopedia Judaica. The chart shows the many predecessor forms of ancient Hebrew, Aramaic, Paleo-Hebrew and Phoenician writings dating from around 1000 BCE (Row 1) to second century BCE (Row 13) which have produced modern Hebrew . The alephbet is at one and the same time the great foundation stone on which all education stands, one of its essential keys opening up the infinite realm of learning and knowledge and helping to unlock the universe of other mysteries.



"Teach your children the path they should walk, and even when they are old, they will not stray from it." Proverbs 22:6

Dynamic Netivot teacher wins international award

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Jewish studies teacher Ellie Gellman brings a dynamic, idealistic approach into her Grade 3 and 5 classes at Netivot HaTorah Jewish Day School in Thornhill, just as she has into her previous classrooms in Minneapolis, Chicago, Washington, Calgary and other places.

"In any school that I've been at, it's always been an exciting challenge to find a way for serious Jewish learning to occur that even people with learning disabilities can be part of," Gellman says. "There must be a way to reach everybody, and I always enjoy finding that way."

Because of her overall classroom excellence, as well as her skills with children and adults with special learning needs, Gellman was recently honored by two North America-wide organizations that promote good Jewish education. At a ceremony in Chicago in September, Gellman received a Covenant Award from the Chicago-based Crown Family Foundation, in conjunction with the New York-based Jewish Education Service of North America (JESNA).

Ellie Gellman

Gellman, who was born in Minneapolis and taught in Calgary for five years before moving to Toronto in 1992, prefers to teach in classrooms where a few children with special education needs are integrated into the group.

"Children with learning disabilities are usually of normal intelligence. Often they are bright kids lacking certain perceptual or memory skills. They need to be taught with a different style or approach," she says.

To reach all the students in a given class, Gellman organizes and presents the material in a variety of ways. While some pupils may learn best by reading a text, others may need to hear the material spoken aloud, and yet others may need to grasp the overall structure of a parshah or story before encountering the details, she says. As teacher, Gellman tries to cover all these needs.

"I try to approach the material in as many ways as possible so that as many kids can learn as possible. There's usually a lot of activities going on at the same time."

Gellman says she has been teaching since the age of 13, when she was given a group of first-graders and told to teach them in a large coat-check area in a synagogue.

"When it comes to special education, things are a lot different from when I was a kid," she remarks. "There were no special needs kids in the classroom back then, and people pretended they weren't there. I want to make a place for them."

Hasia Diner, the mother of one of Gellman's former students in Washington D.C., wrote a glowing letter to the Crown Foundation and JESNA describing Gellman's classroom skills.

"Ellie seemed to me a gentle wizard," the letter read, in part. "She had tricks up her sleeve to get Shira to remember letters and vowel markings and words and grammatical constructs that no classroom teacher had ever been able to do.

"Ellie put as her first priority honing Shira's Hebrew. But she made it clear to Shira and to me that Shira should always know that participating in the Jewish world took many forms and tapped many skills. Being a great Hebrew student was not the be-all and end-all of a Jewish education. She almost instinctively infused their weekly sessions with excitement about Jewish life and ritual."

Gellman is the mother of four children between the ages of seven and 13, all of whom study at Netivot HaTorah.

High school enrolment up

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Rabbi Irwin E. Witty, executive director of the Board of Jewish Education (BJE), is pleased with many of the current developments in Jewish education, he said in a recent interview.

The rabbi, who will be retiring this summer after 28 years at the helm of the BJE, noted that there are now 27 day schools — 17 elementary and 10 secondary — in the Greater Toronto Area (GTA). Four new day schools opened for the 1996-97 academic year — two Lubavitcher schools, the Toronto Heschel School and a small school for seven boys with learning disabilities.

The total day school enrolment this year is 10,173 students, with 8,518 in elementary school and 1,655 in high school. Although the number of elementary day school students is down slightly from last year, Rabbi Witty said he was pleased to see the rise in high school enrolment, noting that the increase of 126 students at the secondary level was a significant number.

He called the numbers for supplementary school enrolment, which dropped by 98 students this year to 6,377 from 6,475, "soft figures," because, he said, there has been a proliferation of private supplementary schools which do not report their enrolment numbers to the BJE. He also expressed concern that many supplementary programs had gone from three to two days of instruction.

According to BJE statistics, in any given year, 50 percent of all Jewish children in the GTA have some form of Jewish education, with 65 percent of those who do receive some form of Jewish education attending day school programs.

And while Rabbi Witty said he would like to see all Jewish children in day schools, realistically they could not all be physically accommodated, even though the system is continuing to grow.

In recent years, four new campuses were opened in Thornhill for Netivot HaTorah Day School, Associated Hebrew Schools, Leo Baeck Day School and Eitz Chaim Schools. Bialik Hebrew Day School is planning to open a campus in Thornhill, Rabbi Witty said, and he expects the Heschel School will soon outgrow its space at the Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue.

Rabbi Witty attributed the burgeoning Jewish education system to the growth of the community, as well as to the community's general recognition of the importance of education.

"Toronto is one of the leading communities on the continent for supporting Jewish education...The single most important vehicle for the preservation of Jewish life is Jewish education," he said.

He also had praise for UJA/Federation: "There's no doubt that without Federation's direct support and appreciation of the importance of Jewish education in Jewish life, we wouldn't be here today.

He said he was "brutally disappointed" by the recent outcome of the Supreme Court challenge of the inequity of funding for religious education in Ontario. There is government subsidization for the Jewish day schools in such provinces as Quebec, Alberta and Manitoba, he added.

The community has a commitment to help those children with limited financial resources to attend day schools, he said. "That implies spending a great deal of money to make this a reality for all segments of the population."

He acknowledged that Jewish education is expensive, especially for large families with only one working parent. Families who balk at the cost "have to re-examine their priorities," he said. "There's not a way out in the short term."

Professional development for Associated teachers

Associated Hebrew Schools, in conjunction with the Torah Department of the Jewish Agency and the Pinkus Foundation, is embarking on an extensive, two-year professional development program.

While most of the program will be offered here in Toronto, participants will also attend a three-week seminar in Israel during the summer.

Rabbi Avraham Soffer, educational director of Associated, explained that the goal of the program is "to enrich the knowledge of our teachers in all facets of Torah She-be'al peh, the oral law."

Courses will include the Jewish life cycle, including new halachic approaches to modern problems, the Jewish calendar and its origin, laws of Shabbat and holidays, Kuzari, Maimonides, and Hebrew grammar.

The summer in Israel will include visits to historical sites, the structure of the siddur, and historic Zionism.

EDUCATION

Heschel school child-oriented

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The new educational kid on the block is garnering a positive response from the community.

The Toronto Heschel School opened this academic year with 52 students enrolled in junior kindergarten to Grade 3. Based on the community response, principal Otto Baruch Rand expects enrolment to double next year, he said in a recent interview.

The school, located in the Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue in North York, plans to add one grade a year until it reaches Grade 8.

Rand, a former principal of the A.J. Heschel School in New York is a co-founder of the Toronto school along with general studies director Gail Baker, integrated arts director Judith Leitner and Judaic studies director Rachael Turkienicz.

There are also Heschel schools in Los Angeles and Beersheva. All three follow the religious teachings of Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel, for whom they are named, but operate independently of each other.

Rand said the Toronto Heschel School has adopted three basic philosophical principles of Heschel: the education is child-oriented, with multiple approaches to foster cognitive learning as well as emotional and spiritual growth; social action is strongly encouraged and geared to both the Jewish and general communities; and there is an emphasis on the unifying concepts among the various Jewish denominations, rather than the differences between them.

The school is non-denominational and is not affiliated with any one group, although traditional practices are taught, Rand said.

The children learn egalitarian prayers and everyone wears head coverings, he said, adding that the school stresses the importance of the family's role in determining which traditions are followed in the home.

From an academic standpoint, the school attempts to individualize learning by using different approaches to fit the needs of individual children, Rand said.

"Not all children shine in the same areas. We try to find the learning strengths of each child."

He said the school uses a multisensory approach to learning, incorporating into the curriculum a variety of arts-based activities, such as art, puppetry, music and drama to tap the senses.

Such activities reinforce and enhance learning, he explained. "Through play and through doing things of interest children learn the most."

This approach, which can accommodate children with a variety of learning needs, is not common in Jewish day schools, he noted.

"We wanted to provide an alternative. We felt there was a need to absorb the child who doesn't do well in the traditional structure," he said.

In the mid-afternoon, all subjects, including Hebrew, are integrated through the exploration of a particular theme in social and environmental studies.

Until that point in the day, students learn the core subjects — math, spelling, reading, Hebrew and Chumash — in small skill groups geared to a student's level of skill, Rand said. "This kind of grouping exists from Grade 1, with children from different grades grouped together for some things."

Rand says the small class size and high teacher ratio — two teachers co-teach 20 children — allow the school to give more individualized attention to students.

The school promotes social awareness, emphasizing the importance of children behaving kindly to each other, he said.

He cited the mitzvah tree program as an example: children observing their peers doing good deeds honor them by putting their names on the mitzvah tree.

He said the first step in developing a social conscience is to teach the children how "to interact with each other in an ethical way."

Jewish Experience popular program at York U.

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Prof. Martin Lockshin's course, the Jewish Experience: symbiosis and rejection, is one of the most popular Jewish studies courses at York University.

The multidisciplinary undergraduate course, which combines history, philosophy and literature is a "good starting point" for pursuing other courses in Jewish studies," says Lockshin, recalling a recent conversation with a retired physician, interested in expanding her knowledge of Judaism.

"She's educated. She's Jewish. But she doesn't know much about Judaism. She thought this course would be a good place to begin." About 30 to 40 percent of the students who enrol go on to take additional Jewish studies courses, he adds.

The second-year level course is a survey of how Jews related to the non-Jewish world around them during the course of 3,000 years of history. In some periods, Jews had symbiotic relationships integrating the best of the host culture into their experience, while at other times Jews rejected the dominant culture and closed themselves off from the mainstream society, Lockshin notes.

Since the students are most interested in talking about 20th-century experiences, the challenge for him is to make the history and issues of the earlier centuries "come to life," he says. To appreciate the present, the students need to understand the past.

The courses examines several primary sources. For example, the students read Maimonides as well as the original documents of the Zionist leaders and the Reform movement debates. Marks are based on a combination of exams and essays, with students writing papers on an aspect of Judaism that interests them most, says Lockshin.

About 100 students are enrolled in the course, nearly four times as many as when he began teaching it 18 years ago, he says. He attributes this growth to the increased interest in Jewish studies, which he says is a reflection of a greater positive acceptance of ethnic identification for minority groups as a whole.

To accommodate the increase in attendance Lockshin has enlisted two other instructors to assist him with the course. They give lectures in their areas of expertise and each of the three leads a tutorial class of about 30 to 35 students. The smaller scale of the tutorials makes them more conducive to group discussions than the lecture hall, Lockshin says.

His co-teachers this year are Dr. Aaron Nussbaum, the former principal of United Synagogue Day School, who has an expertise in Chassidism and Prof. Sol Tanenzapf, who teaches philosophy through the York department of humanities.

New undergrad programs launched

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Beth Jacob High School, an Orthodox girls' school near Bathurst Street and Lawrence Avenue now offers undergraduate degree courses through the Zaidner Institute in Jerusalem.

Rabbi Yosef Posen, Beth Jacob's registrar of post-secondary studies, says that the institute is offered in addition to the school's 20-year-old seminary that prepares girls for a potential teaching career and gives them the skills to pursue Jewish studies in other advanced programs.

The Zaidner Institute, which started up in the fall, gives women the opportunity to work towards a bachelor's degree in humanities or psychology. Courses are taught by local educators with graduate degrees and include Introduction to Psychology, Introduction to Counselling, Statistics and and an assortment of courses in Jewish literature and history.

"Graduates can go to graduate school or begin a career in counselling, teaching or educational psychology. They are well prepared to teach in Hebrew schools," says Rabbi Posen.

"We now have more than 40 students, many of whom graduated from our high school. Most are part-time students, who take as many courses as they can fit into their schedule. If need be, students can continue their studies in Jerusalem or by correspondence," he says.

Girls who choose the Zaidner Institute for their university studies, says Rabbi Posen, do so because of its comfortable environment and its commitment to Orthdoxy. "There are no conflicts with Orthodox standards."

Maimonides College, which has a campus at the Eitz Chaim School on Patricia Avenue, also offers courses for women leading to a bachelor's degree. Courses include Torah and Commentaries, Principles of Education, Gerontology and Halachah of Shabbos.

The college offers counselling for new students or those who are considering taking courses after being away from education for some time. Credits may be transferred from other institutions.

The saga continues...

CJN series students learn how to drive

In this sixth annual instalment, the five students being profiled are much closer to adulthood than childhood. Since 1992, we have looked at their changing views on Judaism, education and life.

We first met Ali Bresver, Naomi Emerson, Chaim Greenwald and Jacob Korenblum within a year of their respective bar and bat mitzvahs. They were suggested by their Jewish school principals as good representatives of their Jewish backgrounds.

The series, written by staff reporter Frances Kraft, will follow the students until the year 2000.

For four of the students, 1996 was the year of the driver's licence, a significant milestone on the road to independence. How significant? Ask them when they got those licences. "April 22," "January 3" and "June 4," answer Ali Bresver, Naomi Emerson and Nathan Wise without hesitation.

Chaim, at 18 the senior member of the group, also got his licence last year. He is still in Milwaukee, where he has attended the Wisconson Institute of Torah Study (WITS) since the age of 14. An alumnus of Eitz Chaim Day School, Chaim graduated from high school in June but stayed on for WITS' Beis Medrash program. He expects to study in Israel in another year or two.

Jacob Korenblum is the only driver's licence holdout, but that fact doesn't appear to have put a crimp in his social life.

In a joint interview at the CJN offices, attended by the four local students, all age 17, Jacob, a student at Northern Secondary School, did let on that his social life is partially restricted by a Friday-night-at-home rule.

A graduate of Bialik Hebrew Day School, Jacob comes from a Conservative family. He admits that he's "come to like Friday night." In fact, Friday night partying isn't necessarily an issue among his friends. "I think people concentrate a lot more on school these days, because this is when it counts," he said. "People will do essays on Friday nights."

Jacob will finish high school in January 1998, and hopes to combine work and travel before starting university.

Ali, who stays home for Shabbat dinner but can go out afterward, gets together with friends from school (Lawrence Park Collegiate), camp and the Israel trip she took with other Reform teens.

She doesn't feel the same pressure to socialize as in her early high school years, she said. "When you're younger, you're more insecure. You think, 'Oh my God, I have to come.' Now I know who my friends are. If I miss one night, they're not going to 'de-friend' me."

"Everything is comfortable," agreed Jacob. "You can put your schoolwork first and not worry about sacrificing your friends. They're doing the same thing."

Although the group is far from considering marriage, dating — and interdating — seems to be a subject they've thought about a lot. Naomi, who attends Orthodox girls' high school, Ulpanat Orot, wouldn't think of dating anyone non-Jewish and would have serious concerns about dating a non-observant Jew. She hopes to study at a women's yeshiva in Israel for a year before pursuing a "secular" career, perhaps as an occupational therapist or a teacher.

Unlike most of her friends, she worked at a secular day camp last summer, helping integrate special needs kids. Many staff members were Jewish but non-observant and even more were non-Jews. "I wasn't really interested in any guy there, but if I was — what if?" she wondered.

"I don't think I'd ever get myself into that situation. I think a common sense of observance can really bond you. I see what a vital role it plays in my house. The way I lead my life is so important to me in terms of Yiddishkeit."

Jacob, Nathan and Ali agreed that Naomi's words made sense. "My friends tell me it can cause weaknesses to intermarry," said Ali, although Jacob knows children of mixed marriages who got "an even balance." In contrast to Naomi, Jacob has mostly non-Jewish friends and has interdated.

In a way, he said, he thinks Naomi is "almost lucky" to be starting from a social circle that is almost exclusively Jewish. For him to marry someone non-Jewish, or not marry her if he believed she was the right person, would be "a sacrifice either way," Jacob said.

"For me, you hold [onto] the person, because you can still live with the faith. I would continue to be Jewish and my children [would] be brought up knowing about Judaism."

Ali agrees with Jacob. "I'm not going to go out looking for someone Christian. I'd much rather it be someone Jewish, but if it happens, there's nothing I'm going to be able to do about it.

"I'm a very picky person to begin with," she added.

Chaim, in Wisconsin, sees marriage as "not so far off. Another four years is probably about the time." His four years of high school went by "like nothing," he said, "so I obviously think about it."

Despite his long hours at the yeshiva, Chaim works in a weekly game of ice hockey with a local league. He follows hockey and other news in the New York Times, as well on the radio.

Jacob continues to attend the Downtown Jewish Community School for weekly classes which address issues such as last fall's opening of the Jerusalem tunnel entrance.

Chaim Greenwald

Like the other students, he has strong feelings about media portrayal of the Middle East. He's convinced that for the media "what sells" is more important than "news per se."

Despite his disapproval of the contentious tunnel opening, Jacob felt that media stories on the subject "were slanted so much to the favor of the Palestinians." A keen follower of the news since at least age 12, Jacob hopes to pursue a career in international relations.

As one of the few Jewish students at his school, he has become a source for news about Israel among his peers. "We've been to Israel, some of us speak Hebrew, so they figure we have some idea of what's going on."

"We only know what the media feeds us," said Naomi. Through e-mail, she's heard stories that don't make the news.

As the group gets older, they are more appreciative of their Jewish education.

"I appreciate the Jewish part of CHAT more," said Nathan, who previously attended United Synagogue Day School. "I realize you can't get that in many other places. Going there was more my parents' choice than mine, but I think I would have picked it anyway." Nathan expects to complete high school this year, but hadn't yet applied to any universities at the time of the interview.

Ali, who plans to study journalism after she finishes high school next year, continues to teach at Temple Emanu-El's Sunday school, where she participates wholeheartedly in services with her young students.

Although she said last year that she didn't believe in God, she has since become more open-minded. "Part of me says there's science, and part of me says, what if?"

While the issue doesn't occupy her mind constantly, she is reminded of it when she sees her students' attitudes. "Wow!" she thinks. "It's so innocent. I wish I could think things like that and not have all these questions come into my mind."

"I think it's important to be exposed to religion," said Nathan, "because then at least you'll have the option. If you don't expose your kids to religion, it's not fair, because then they don't have the means to lead their lives in a certain way."

"I think the key word is options," said Jacob. "I'm pretty much free to make my own decisions, but I'm still a member of a family. I live in a house. I have a great deal of respect for the way my parents feel about Judaism and the way they brought me up."

Ali has come to believe that religious and family values are interrelated for both her and her Christian friends. "My parents have given me a good stable upbringing. They allow me to question and say what I want freely." Her parents have differing views on religion, she said, and that has led her to conclude that "being Jewish can be different for every person as long as it means something to you in your heart."

On the other hand, noted Nathan, "more secular people can exist because of the Orthodox. They kind of carry the torch. Maybe I wouldn't pick that lifestyle, but I think the Orthodox play a really important role in the community."

Caring professional attitudes necessary for pre-schools

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Children can usually decide for themselves if they are going to like a daycare or preschool, says the director of Torah Tots, a preschool in Chabad of Markham Community Centre.

"We encourage parents to bring the kids to see the school before making a choice. They can pick up a warm and caring atmosphere. They really are the best judges," says Goldie Plotkin.

The government sets strict guidelines for preschools and dayschools with regard to the number of teachers, size of the room and safety of the equipment, says Plotkin, but those are not the only things about which parents should be concerned when choosing a school.

"Make sure there is an open door policy. Parents should be free to come in and help out or just observe the class. We have large windows in the classroom so parents can peak in at any time. I would worry if parents were not allowed in the room.

"I don't set the school's philosophy and goals alone. We all do it together so parents have a say in their child's education. School and home should be a partnership," she says.

Devorah Shmulewitz, director of Loving Care Day Care Centre, says that most parents need only one visit to decide if a school is right for their child.

"There is a feeling in the air. If children and staff are smiling and happy, chances are your child will be happy as well. Kids do not respond well to tension. If staff is tense, a child can pick that up.

"The classroom needs to be a relaxed place. There should be no rigid rules that children absolutely must follow. Teachers need to be creative and give the kids room to grow," she says.

Children should feel part of a democratic process, says Shmulewitz. "If a child does something wrong, he should not be reprimanded. The staff should have the child question himself as to how he should have behaved. When treated fairly, kids can adult-up to a situation and come to their own conclusions."

Preschool plays an important role in a child's life," says Plotkin. "By the age of four, a child needs to socialize with other children and learn to give and take. We try and let children handle their own problems so they learn how to communicate. By this age they need to be able to talk things out with other people."

Nursery and kindergarten students need a lot of stimulation, she says. "All our learning is done through playing. The kids don't even know they're learning. If they are learning about sorting, for instance, they'll sort things related to a theme such as Chanukah or Shabbat. A good school makes it fun to learn."

Spirituality, says Shmulewitz, is the umbrella that embraces everything good about a school. "It gives the children an inner security because they know that everyone is part of one big whole."

CHAT, Associated offer Hebrew upgrading

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The instruction of Jewish heritage subjects at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) is all supposed to be in Hebrew, but that isn't always possible in practice.

CHAT, a Toronto-area Jewish high school, draws most of its students from five feeder day schools across the Greater Toronto Area: Associated Hebrew Schools; Bialik Hebrew Day School, Leo Baeck Day School, United Synagogue Day School and Netivot HaTorah Day School.

The basic statement of philosophy of CHAT's educational program insists on the use of Hebrew as the prime language of instruction for Jewish heritage and the study of classical and modern Jewish sources.

But CHAT educators became aware that a growing number of students coming to the school did not have the requisite language skills to study all Judaic subjects in Hebrew. To accommodate them, the school introduced several alternative Hebrew programs last year, CHAT headmaster Rabbi Marvin Pachino said in an interview.

"You're always modifying as you go along," he says.

There is a developmental program which offers increased hours of language instruction to Grade 9 students so that they can improve their level of Hebrew to qualify for the advanced Hebrew program in Grade 10.

Students who fail to qualify for the advanced program at the end of Grade 9 can continue with a modified program until the end of Grade 12, Rabbi Pachino said.

He explained that eligibility for the modified program is determined by faculty assessments of each student, with input from guidance personnel and the school adminstration.

(The modified program should not be confused with the New Stream program for students who have not previously attended Hebrew day schools, he explained. That program has been in operation for some 25 years.)

Rabbi Pachino stressed that the majority of students entering CHAT have acquired adequate Hebrew skills to qualify for the advanced Grade 9 Hebrew program.

He added that there is no social stigma for students in the modified program because the approach by the school is positive. "The kids in there appreciate it."

This year, Associated Hebrew Schools followed CHAT's lead by introducing a modified Hebrew program for Grade 7 and 8 students, educational director Rabbi Abraham Soffer told The CJN.

The program is for students who have had difficulty getting through the language program.

In order to keep these students in the school, a small class of 15 students at the Danilack campus on Finch Avenue have been grouped together to study Judaic subjects taught with English explanations.

This class runs parallel to many Judaic classes at the same grade level so that students in the modified Hebrew program can join the regular classes for general studies, Rabbi Soffer explained.

The school determines who can join the class, he said.

"Our responsibility is to help [weaker students]...In the past, many left [the school]...We have a social responsibility not to let these kids leave."

EDUCATION

New Or Haemet director hopes to boost enrolment

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

If all goes according to plan, Or Haemet Sephardic School will move to its new building at Bathurst and Steeles in April, according to Rabbi Mordechai Sevy its new educational director.

Rabbi Sevy, a sabra who graduated with honors from the Israeli Military Academy, is hoping that the present enrolment of 200 will triple in the new location, which is much closer to where 90 percent of Or Haemet's students live.

Though Or Haemet has been at Adath Israel for 15 years, it was always considered a temporary location, Rabbi Sevy said.

It has 13 classrooms and a teaching and support staff of 30 for children age 5 to 14, from junior kindergarten to Grade 8. The same classrooms are used by the synagogue's Talmud Torah students after school hours.

A friendly, bear-like figure in physical appearance, Rabbi Sevy at the age of 43 brings impressive credentials to his new post. A graduate of a yeshivah in Cleveland, Ohio, he was chief Sephardi rabbi of Australia from 1989 to 1993; 10 years earlier he was associated with the Talmud Torah of Beth El Synagogue in Halifax for three years.

Rabbi Mordechai Sevy

A single-minded advocate of multiculturalism, Rabbi Sevy is convinced that Hebrew day schools such as Or Haemet turn out better citizens and people who have a greater than average sense of social accountability to the whole community.

He is "disappointed" that, in turning down financial assistance for parochial schools, the Supreme Court of Canada "got entangled in statistics and budgets without looking at the whole picture."

Some of Or Haemet's pupils come from the former Soviet republics of Belarus, Georgia and Kurdistan, a part of south Russia where there is a large Sephardi population. A small number of non-Sephardi children attend Or Haemet, which welcomes all.

A linguist who speaks English, Hebrew, French, Italian, Spanish, Portuguese and Yiddish — not all fluently — Rabbi Sevy likes nothing more than to wander into a classroom and be greeted in Hebrew or English, French or Spanish. Before they graduate , Or Haemet students are given 1,000 hours of French instruction.

Rabbi Sevy and his wife, Rochelle, formerly of Detroit, have six children — as the rabbi put it, "three Yankees, one Haligonian, and two Aussies." All the children attend the school.

Young Sephardim learn roots

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

What do the old-world customs of their parents and grandparents have to do with young Sephardi adults today?

More than they might have thought, as some of them are discovering through a weekly evening course offered by Medrash Torah Vehayim: The Sephardic Institute of Torah Study..

"It's wonderful. Customs taught to me by my mother and my grandmother, [for which] I never knew the reasons, take on a whole new significance," said Annie Sugar, 34, after a recent Sephardic Life Cycle class taught by Rabbi Amram Assayag, director of the learning centre and spiritual leader of Petah Tikva Anshe Castilla.

About three dozen people attended the one-hour class, prolonging the time with animated questions about the concept of the evil eye.

Customs often derive from sources in rabbinic literature, said Rabbi Assayag. "What I tell people is, be ready to accept that your custom may not have a source, but don't ever neglect a custom or think it's silly."

Orna Serruya, 24, learned about Sephardi wedding customs and those relevant to the birth of a child. "For me it was great. I'd just gotten married and was planning a family," she said.

The Learning Centre, which opened two years ago, is housed at the Main Exchange Plaza, on the northwest corner of Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue in Thornhill, pending the opening of the new Or Haemet Sephardic School building just north of the plaza, scheduled for later this year.

"The Sephardi community [of almost 8,000 people] was missing a centre where members of the congregations could gather to study and discuss Sephardic issues specifically. We felt there was a need to pass on to the new generation all the [Sephardi] customs," said Rabbi Assayag.

For its efforts, the Learning Centre was awarded a grant in October from UJA Federation's action committee for Jewish continuity.

Weeknight classes include Pirkei Avot, Halachah, Talmud Torah, Tefilah, chevruta learning and services. In addition to Rabbi Assayag, classes are also taught by Rabbis Elisha Afriat, Moshe Bensalmon, Abraham Kubayov and Shalom Revah.

Certain classes are restricted to either men or women; others are mixed. Not all the participants are Sephardim, noted Rabbi Assayag. In the Life Cycles class (open to men and women), "a good 20 percent" are not.

Conflict managers solve crises in the schoolyard

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Time was that if things got a bit too rough in the schoolyard, kids had to turn to a teacher on duty, but it wasn't always the best way to solve the problem.

That was then. Today, if you check out recess at Associated Hebrew Schools' Thornhill campus, you'll see the same old horseplay among students. But if the language or behavior gets out of hand, kids can turn to an older peer for help.

They're called conflict managers — Grade 6 students recognizable by their bright orange armbands — specially trained and ready to defuse most crises that come up among younger pupils.

First and foremost, they espouse non-violent ways to solve disputes. Their ground rules are simple: listen with an open mind; no blaming, name calling or yelling; tell the truth; and work to solve the problem.

Those problems may involve kid stuff like fighting, bullying, teasing or snatching a ball, but to small children, they're real and threatening. And younger children are more comfortable talking to a fellow student than to a teacher, because they are less likely to get into trouble.

So on any given day, groups of three conflict managers per recess may be seen having their sleeves tugged by a little one who has a problem.

The project "has worked beautifully, beyond our expectations," says Associated Grade 6 teacher Sheryl Lister, who trains the managers in 5½ hour sessions that focus on alternative ways to solve disputes. The program has grown from 15 to 24 participants. Lister says being a conflict manager has become something of a status symbol.

In the process, she points out, the managers learn valuable real life skills. Dealing with conflict in constructive, positive ways and keeping a cool head head while others around you lose theirs will always stand one in good stead.

Lister got the idea for the program from her own kids and from other schools and boards. It's modeled on Peaceworks, a successful project in Florida.

It was launched at Associated as a pilot project last year, and the conflict managers took to the schoolyard in October, along with a series of assemblies at which students were introduced to the idea. To this day, the Conflict Resolution Rap is chanted like a mantra: "If push comes to shove, just fill in with love."

The conflict managers themselves abide by a commitment to behave professionally, to be fair and honest and to keep things confidential (although they do fill out forms used mainly to identify repeat offenders).

Lister and Associated supervisor Brenda Goldstein say they've noticed a drop in violent activity in the schoolyard. Typically, the managers deal with complaints of name-calling, taking of property, cheating at games and even unwanted kissing.

"Very few kids ask me for help," Lister says. "They ask for a conflict manager, and almost always, the problem is defused on the spot."

Teacher's goal to bring out best in each student: Rubinoff

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

The Art of Teaching, Practical Strategies for Effective Chinuch (Feldheim Publishers), one of the first books of its kind, was written by Elaine Rubinoff, a teacher, private consultant to parents and schools, and former principal of She'arim Hebrew Day School, a school for children with learning disabilities.

A good teacher must do far more than convey information, says Rubinoff. "Teachers must also convey humanity, love, compassion and feeling but most of all, a way of life."

One of the most challenging aspects of teaching, she says, is meeting the diverse needs of students and providing them with the special attention they need.

"Compounding this challenge is the fact that most [teachers] have not received the specialized training required to meet the learning needs of all the students. Time and resources, however, are often inadequate for providing professional guidance for teachers."

Elaine Rubinoff

With this in mind, says Rubinoff, she wrote The Art of Teaching, in order to present teaching techniques that can supplement methods already in use in the classroom.

The reader-friendly text, accompanied by explanatory margin notes, addresses such topics as identifying students with learning problems, setting students up for success, helping to develop organizational skills, maintaining proper discipline and using encouragement effectively.

Effective teachers, she says, are always willing to try new techniques and to take risks. "When you do make a mistake, and everyone does, it is important to remember that it is not you who failed, but the method that you were using. Take time to reflect on the situation and think about what didn't work and what you might do differently the next time."

Teachers must see each of their students as an individual, she says.

Quoting Rav Chaim Shmuelevitz, she explains that the Gemara compares a teacher to a raindrop. "Why? Just as rain functions to unlock the potential of each and every seed, so is it a teacher's primary goal to bring out the unique potential of each talmid (student)."

She advises teachers to find others with whom they can brainstorm, to set realistic goals of learning one new technique at a time, celebrate all successes and "above all don't forget to laugh. Seeing the humor in a situation often helps to put it in the right perspective. We should never take ourselves too seriously."

Group encourages education for special needs' children

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

A group of Jewish parents has recently banded together to fight for a Jewish education for every child with special needs.

The group, known as ChaYil, is dedicated to implementing programs to integrate children with physical and developmental disabilities into Jewish day schools.

Jacob Feinstat, who has two children with special needs ages nine and six, says that a void in the Jewish educational system prevents many students from receiving a Jewish education.

"Zareinu caters to children with a variety of disabilities, but it is only equipped to teach children until about age 12. Then there is nowhere for them to go.

"Some schools allow in children who have their own worker, but the reality is that most parents cannot afford to hire someone," he says.

Jewish schools are under tremendous financial pressure, he says, and do not put priority on integrating students with special needs . "Scores of kids are falling between the cracks."

To this end, Feinstat says, ChaYil was formed. "Our mandate is to convince schools such as Eitz Chaim, which has several campuses in the city, to provide us with a resource room. We will bring in experts to cater to the children's needs. Common time with the other students will ensure that our kids are fully integrated."

He insists that it is not money that is preventing schools from taking in children with special needs.

"We believe that attitude is the problem. Money flows from community goodwill. In Chicago, this type of program is present in every Jewish school. It can be done when the attitude is appropriate.

"The problem here is that some schools feel that parents would be uncomfortable with having special needs students in the school. Research has proven, however, that all children do benefit from the integration. The negative attitudes are just not there."

He adds that as far as cost is concerned, ChaYil has submitted a "zero cost plan. One worker, funded by us, would go to school with the child. We would do all the fundraising.

"It is difficult to ask for funds, however, until we can show that our plan can work. We have a fantastic concept and some schools do give us their full support."

Meanwhile, says Feinstat, "children's lives are passing by. Halachically, it is the community's, not just the parents', obligation to educate all children in a Jewish environment."

Legacy of Holocaust passes down the generations

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Teaching the Holocaust, even to Jews, had to wait until its survivors were able to talk about it and society was ready to hear about it, says Pnina Zilberman, director of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre in Toronto.

When the war ended, she told an audience of over 100 at the Bernard Betel Centre during last fall's Holocaust Education Week, the objective of the survivors was "to create a new life, new families and new professions."

It was only in 1960, she said, with the capture and trial of Adolf Eichmann, that people became aware that the survivors had importance as witnesses to the events many were beginning to deny.

Eichmann's trial was followed by the publication of Eli Wiesel's Night, the upsurge in Jewish identity after the Six Day War and the second generation confronting their own issues around being descendents of survivors in the late 1970s.

"The legacy of Holocaust teaching was passed to the children, who were determined to tell the stories," Zilberman said.

There was no proper teaching of the Holocaust in schools, she said, except as a "footnote to World War II," maybe, she mused, "because of guilt that they [society as a whole, and non-Jewish teachers and education ministries] hadn't done more to help, or because they hadn't realized [what was going on]."

Informal Holocaust education began and continues, Zilberman said, with television programs, movies like Schindler's List, stories and books written for children, trips to former concentration camps (business travellers to Munich, for instance, began to go to Dachau), and, most of all, "grandchildren asking questions."

Many times, she said, it was easier for survivors to talk about their experiences with their grandchildren than it had been with their children.

The Holocaust is now on the formal curricula of many school systems, for example in the Maritimes, in Catholic schools and in 15 states in the United States. The North York Board of Education, she said, "was the first board to write a specific curriculum on the Holocaust."

As well, it is no longer just studied as history, Zilberman said, noting that it has moved into other disciplines, such as psychology, social work, medicine, business, women's studies and English literature.

Memorial centres are another way the message of the Holocaust is brought to the public, most notably Yad Vashem in Jerusalem and the Holocaust Memorial Centre in Washington.

It is important, she said, for Holocaust education to show that the victims of the Nazis had a life before the war, that they had "cottages in the country, travelled and led a normal life."

She also stressed the importance of teaching about the righteous gentiles and about the danger in following a charismatic and powerful leader for the sake of security.

The effect of survivor testimony cannot be underestimated, she said. "Everyone who sees life as a gift sends a message that we made it."

Kibbutz life unique learning experience

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

For Sarah Feldman and Sascha Gurwitz, both 17, Grade 11 was a year to remember.

The pair, who spent the year in Israel attending The American Class at Kibbutz Beit Hashita, agree that the experience "was once in a lifetime."

The 12-year-old program, founded by director Amichai Yarchi, is geared to Grade 10 or 11 students across North America. Classes are in English and based on an American curriculum. Students live in residence and each is adopted for the year by a kibbutz family.

"This was not a program that emphasized a strong curriculum, but it did offer things that we just could not get here.We had the chance to travel, work on a kibbutz and really see Israel. Where else can a history teacher take you to see actual sites?" asked Feldman, a Grade 12 student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

The work aspect of the program gave the students an idea of what kibbutz life is all about, said Gurwitz, who worked in the kindergarten for several hours a week and was often on kitchen detail.

"Every job was important. If we ever missed a day we felt like we were letting people down, said the Metro Prep Academy student.

Living and working on the kibbutz, Feldman agreed, "made us feel involved. We took part in kibbutz-wide meals and celebrations and learned a lot about living in a community. Our adopted family really become like a second family. Most of us bonded with our families immediately.

"We also learned a lot about ourselves. We were away from home and forced to deal with our own problems. I would say we all matured," she said.

"For one year we lived a different life than we had ever known." said Gurwich. "We got the chance to really know Israel other than from a tourist's perspective. We also made friendships that will probably last forever. It has been difficult immersing ourselves in Canadian society again."

As alumni, one of Feldman and Gurwich's goals is to reassure parents of potential students about kibbutz security. "We were never left unattended off the kibbutz and all security precautions were taken."

Yiddish education thrives

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Yiddish is thriving in Toronto where it is being taught to second, third and fourth generation Jews through several different programs.

One of the most intensive is the Yiddish immersion program that was introduced last year at Cheder Chabad, a Lubavitcher school for boys. Rabbi Baruch Zaltzman, the school principal, told The CJN he has noticed a definite improvement in the students' level of comprehension of Yiddish since the immersion program that begins at the kindergarten level was inaugurated.

Rabbi Zaltzman said the school expanded Yiddish, which was only taught as a subject to the immersion program for Judaic subjects, because the students – the majority speak English at home – needed more exposure to absorb the language.

"They knew how to read. But the only way for them to understand the rebbes was to be immersed in the language."

The students continue to have regular Yiddish instruction to improve their reading and writing skills along with formal study of Lubavitch writings, he added.

Yiddish is "a dear language to Chassidim" because their leaders expressed their most important thoughts in this language, Rabbi Zaltzman noted. "Yiddish should be encouraged and kept up. It's part and parcel of the Jewish nation."

One of the longest running children's Yiddish programs is offered at Bialik Hebrew Day School as part of the curriculum for student in grades 3 through 8. Yiddish is studied as a language and a culture, three to four times a week," said Dr. Uri Korin, principal of Bialik. "Yiddish is an integral part of our education at Bialik...It has always had a role...The culture of our people is of paramount importance."

The students study the language and shtetl culture through music and literature. They read the works of such authors as J.L. Peretz and Shalom Aleichem in Yiddish and discuss it in Yiddish as well, Korin said, noting that all holiday performances at the school include presentations in Yiddish.

There are also Yiddish language programs for children offered on Sundays. According to Sylvia Lustgarten, director of the Committee for Yiddish UJA/ Federation, one of the problems of providing Yiddish classes at both the children's and adult level is the shortage of good teachers.

The committee is in the process of developing a high quality Yiddish teacher training program, Lustgarten said. The Yiddish teachers from Bialik are providing leadership to this program, she added.

The Yiddish committee has just hired a coordinator for the Sunday Yiddish heritage language program it sponsors at Associated Hebrew School's Finch campus. Seventy - five children are enrolled.

The classes, which are open to all children in the Greater Toronto Area, are jointly funded by the education boards of North York and York Region. The Yiddish committee is also advocating the establishment of more high school Yiddish classes, Lustgarten said.

She stressed the importance of keeping alive the secular Ashkenazi culture that is rooted in Yiddish. "Yiddish helps people get back to the roots of Jewish life...The Ashkenazi culture is the civilization that prepared Jews for their successes in America."

New schedule at UCS

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Gella Weiss has heard countless parents complain of how ineffective extra-curricular Hebrew school used to be in the old days, when teachers used unimaginative teaching methods and seemed to spend as much time disciplining students as teaching them.

Weiss, principal of United Congregational Schools headquartered in Beth David Synagogue in North York, is working to change all that.

"Parents have often complained that the only thing that tied them to their friends in Hebrew school was that they were all miserable together," she says. "I don't think we need another generation of that. So what we're looking for are different ways to make education come alive for today's students."

For students who attend public schools, the Conservative movement prescribes six hours of Jewish education each week after regular school. The time is usually split into three two-hour segments, two on weekday evenings and a third on Sunday mornings. At United Congregational Schools, however, the Sunday morning class is 3½ hours long, and students are required to attend only one more class of 2½ hours during the week.

The innovative schedule allows classes to go on numerous field trips, and Weiss says that taking students out of the traditional classroom setting is an important means of bringing their Jewish education to life.

Students in the lower grades have gone on class trips to Earl Bales Park to see the Holocaust Memorial, while students in the higher grades have visited the Holocaust Remembrance Centre as well as the Jewish Public Library in the Lipa Green Building on Bathurst Street.

For the first half of the year, Grade seven students study the history of Canadian Jewry, with the emphasis on the early Jews of Toronto. "We go down to the Holy Blossom Temple, which was the first synagogue in Toronto," says Weiss. "And they do projects about when their families came to Toronto, they study anti-Semitism and they do a whole unit on the riot in Christie Pits.

The three upper grades of 5, 6 and 7 at UCS are put on a rotating schedule. "The students are taught by specialists in each area," says Weiss. "They spend 40 minutes with a given teacher and then they get up and go to a different room."

By grade 7 the curriculum is "quite varied," according to Weiss, with subjects including history, Chumash, Mishna, language and biblical heroes. "By Grade seven, the Chumash curriculum includes the passages that talk about Jewish laws. It's something a little different. By grade 7 the higher thinking skills kick in and the kids really take hold of it and really enjoy it."

Unlike their parents' generation, today's students do not always have to be sitting at a desk for learning to occur, says Weiss. "Don't get the wrong impression – there are still plenty of days where they are sitting in their seats and doing traditional learning.

"But we're working in as much alternate programming as we can. We're not where we want to be yet, but I think this is the education of the future."

Russians integrate at CIP

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Russian immigrants Tatiana and Mikhail Alperovitch didn't know anyone when they arrived in Canada two years ago but they say they were able to establish friendships with local Toronto Jews through the Community Integration Program (CIP).

Their family is one of hundreds that have been helped by CIP, founded eight years ago to address the needs of newly arrived Russian Jewish immigrants in Toronto.

CIP is co-sponsored by UJA/Federation and the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC). Its activities — most take place at the BJC — are organized and facilitated by both Canadian and Russian volunteers.

Supervisor Luda Felik runs the program with help from three other staff members and works in conjunction with CIP co-chairs Natan Aronshtam and Marsha Slavens and past chair Susan Goldberg.

According to Felik, the volunteers are the backbone of the program, which relies on the support of 100 Canadian and 150 Russian volunteers.

One of the programs CIP offers is the Shalom Centre, located at the BJC. It provides newcomers with a variety of programs, including English as a Second Language (ESL) classes with North York Board of Education teachers as well as special memberships to the BJC.

The After School Children's Program, held from 5 to 7 p.m. three days a week at the BJC, is designed to strengthen Jewish identity by teaching the children about Jewish heritage and traditions.

Slavens, a co-founder of the project, says it was established because the Toronto Jewish community did not do a good job of integrating Russian immigrants who arrived in the 1970s.

She says the Jewish Women's Federation (JWF), which provided the initial funding for the program, was and continues to be supportive, and noted that the Russian integration committee of the JWF is active in co-hosting holiday celebrations, cultural evenings and special events through affiliates.

Slavens estimates that there are between 25,000 and 30,000 Russian Jews who have settled in Toronto.

Puttin' on the Glitz with Toronto's Party Planning Pros

Rick Levine of Times Square Entertainment and party consultant Lynn Cohen, meet recently in the studio of photographer Joe Lavee to discuss details of this years 5th annual "We're Having a Party" show.

TORONTO "We are thrilled with the way this event has evolved", says a smiling Rick Levine of Times Square Entertainment, who along with party consultant Lynn Cohen will share the responsibilities of coordinating two major community party planning events - Monday January 27th (uptown) at the Premiere Banquet Hall in Markham and Tuesday January 28th (downtown) at the Sheraton Centre, on Queen St., in the Grand Ballroom. Dozens of party service companies are coming together in order to present their products and services in a very unique format.

Unlike the many conventional trade shows we've all attended, this party displays the talents and efforts of the collective energy as well as individuals involved. The guests will be sampling products and services in a unique atmosphere, giving them a perfect opportunity to make decisions based on what they see, hear and taste for themselves."

"Any one who has attended one of our previous shows will know we present a first class event designed to help people plan a sensational wedding, Bar/Bat Mitzvah or company Party."

"Many people feel overwhelmed after taking on the responsibility of planning a party. "We're Having A Party" holds an annual event where the public can meet with experts in virtually every area of the party planning field."

"The idea of organizing a function and combining all of our creative energies struck us as an exciting and novel way to reach the public while at the same time making it fun for those shopping the party market", declares Lynn Cohen, one of Toronto's busiest bridal and party consultants. "The event has continued to build each year to become a celebrated annual event.

Door prizes, food tasting live musical showcases...

This year we decided to organize a downtown show in addition to the uptown event in order to make contact with the people planning events in the downtown areas.

There are lots of door prizes, food tasting, live musical showcases, demonstrations and the admission is free . "As in past shows, we expect several thousand visitors from all areas of the community to attend ."

Our party planning handbook which is distributed free of charge at the shows, is designed to simplify the workload for people planning a wide variety of important social events.

Arava Institute ties environment to peace

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Possibly the most intriguing aspect of a new environmental studies centre in Israel has little to do with saving water or fighting to save a given species of bird from extinction.

The Arava Institute for Environmental Studies (AIES), launched only last fall on a kibbutz 30 kilometres north of Eilat that almost straddles the Jordanian border, is involved in such basic ecological questions and how they affect the region.

But three of its first students, including the first Jordanian to study in Israel, also stress that one of the institute's main terms of reference is to show what is ecologically possible through peace.

The institute, although private, is linked to Tel Aviv University (TAU) and was founded by one of its professors, Alon Tal, to bring together undergraduate environment students from Israel, Jordan and the Diaspora. Their common agenda is to preserve the region's scarce resources and fragile ecological balance while showing that "the environment can be a tool in the peace process," said Akram Tubishat, a native of Irbid, Jordan.

To that end, three of the institute's first students – Tubishat, Torontonian Daniela Kiguel and Israeli Tamir Ya'ari – were in Toronto and Montreal recently to talk about AIES with environmental studies students at York and McGill universities.

They also met locally with Tom Axworthy of the CRB Foundation, one of several private sources of funding for the centre.

The trio is also travelling down the U.S. east coast – a second AIES delegation is covering the west coast and the U.S. midwest – meeting with students at other academic institutions, including Harvard and MIT, before going back to Israel for the next semester in February.

In its inaugural year, they said, AIES, the only English-language undergraduate environmental studies program in Israel, has attracted three Jordanians and seven Jewish and three Arab Israelis, three Canadians, along with several Americans and South Africans.

Palestinian students expected

The new centre had hoped to draw even more Jordanians and even a few Palestinian students for its first semester, Ya'ari said, but potential Arab enthusiasm over AIES was dampened by the election of Israel's new government and the Jerusalem tunnel incident last year.

Still, AIES is expected to welcome its first Palestinian students next month. Tubishat had only good things to say about AIES and Israel, despite misgivings expressed by friends and family before he left Jordan.

"You know, peace is not only between governments, it is between people," said the 22-year-old, who has a civil engineering degree from Jordan University.

"Water, air and wild animals do not know about borders, so cooperation between all of our countries is a must," he said.

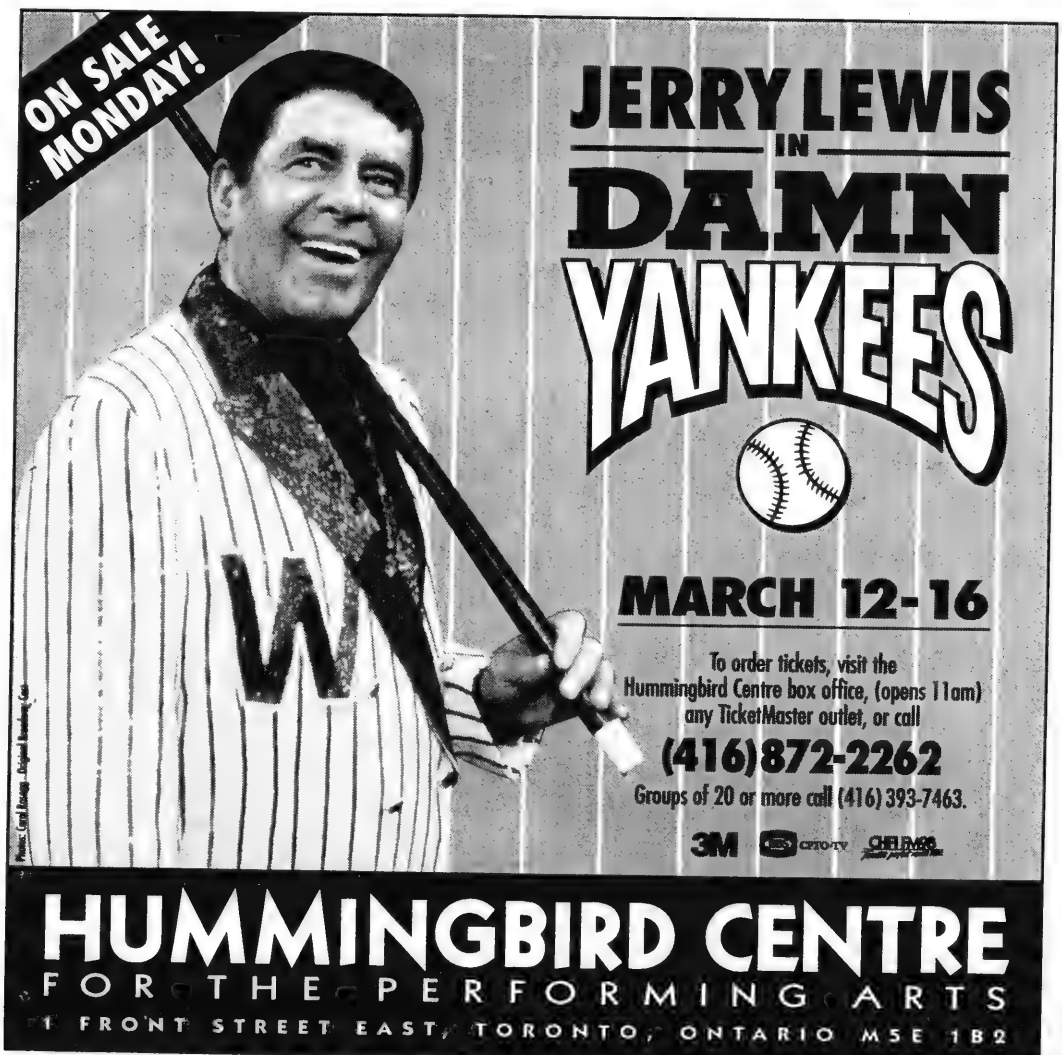
Tubishat's travelling companions agree. Ya'ari, 30, has a BA in agriculture and the environment from Hebrew University and speaks about the need for Israel, Jordan and other nations in the region to collaborate on literally life-and-death issues, such as water, air pollution and sewage management.

Kiguel, 21, is a York University environmental studies student and is attending AIES as a one-year overseas student.

AIES, situated in Kibbutz Ketura, is described in its literature as a private research and teaching facility and a regional centre "for conservation and environmental protection activities." Programs are designed to train future professionals in the field and to provide "a solid theoretical grounding in environmental studies as well as practical skills" needed for conservation activities.

To be eligible for AIES, students must have completed a full year at an accredited university program. AIES also accepts graduate students and, with special permission, high school graduates who have not yet entered university.

More information on AIES is available by contacting Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University's director of academic affairs, Mark Rubenstein, at 1-800-ONLY TAU (665-9828).



Sunshine melts Chocolate Sunday crowds

By MAURICE LUCOW
Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — Jan. 12 was one of the sunniest, driest days Victoria had experienced since the city dug itself out of a vicious blizzard a week earlier.

"We [competed] with the beautiful weather," says Hadassah leader Ana Porzecanski, as she recalled that last year hundreds of Victorians lined up in the pouring rain to get into the chocolate event which attracted about 6000 people.

This year, only 4000 tickets were sold. "The crowds on the street preferred to stay out and enjoy the sun and I can't blame them after the weather we've had," said Porzecanski.

This year's event raised a considerable amount for Hadassah-WIZO, "but not enough to meet our quota. Members will have to work that much harder for the next major project, the Youth Aliyah campaign, which gets under way shortly," she said.

Porzecanski said Youth Aliyah funds raised will be dedicated to the memory of Louise Gordon. The pioneer Victoria member who died recently, organized the city's first-ever Hadassah bazaar. Meanwhile the Hadassah chapters, Victoria and Today's Woman, are planning to revamp next year's Chocolate Sunday.

Controversy erupts over Jewish role in Foreign Affairs

Scene in Ottawa

By RICHARD CLEROUX

OTTAWA – There is a major controversy raging at Foreign Affairs over the department's treatment of its Jews, and why it seems so difficult for Jews to get diplomatic postings to Israel.

The debate has spilled over to include the department's policy towards the Likud government of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

The debate over Jews as diplomats to Israel replays itself over and over at Foreign Affairs every few years. The last time was about five years ago, when Norman Spector, a former principal secretary to then prime minister Brian Mulroney, became the first Jewish person ever appointed Canadian ambassador to Israel.

Now Spector is back. He works for Imperial Tobacco in Montreal and writes an occasional commentary in the Globe and Mail about foreign affairs (usually about Israel).

It was in that newspaper that he restarted the whole debate late last summer, when he said the Middle East Branch of the department is controlled by "Arabists" who have misled their political masters and deliberately provide them with wrong information about Israel. (This is just about the worst thing you can say to a public servant. It goes against everything they stand for.)

Spector uses the word "Arabist." It literally means "a student of Arabic," (which is probably a good thing to be if you're in the Middle East Branch.)

But Spector gives it a different meaning, like those people who use the word "Zionist" to mean more nefarious than just being a supporter of Theodor Herzl.

Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy replied with his own letter, defending his officials, calling them "true professionals, acting in the best interests of the country" and denying any bias in his department against Israel.

Axworthy accused Spector of doing "a disservice" to Canada. Spector has described our participation in the Middle East Refugee Working Group as "a sideshow."

Spector who came back with another column, repeating his attack, adding that the "Arabists" had even gone as far as telling Jews in the department to make their careers elsewhere.

Norman Spector

That sparked outrage at Foreign Affairs. Letters began pouring in to the Globe and Mail from current and former department officials.

Michael Shenstone, former head of the Middle East Branch, took great exception to Spector's attacks, particularly to being called an "Arabist."

Erik B. Wang, former director-general of the Middle East Branch, said that to suggest there is discrimination against Jews in the department is "an irresponsible slur" and that Spector is "discrediting nobody but himself."

Outrage of this kind hadn't been heard for years among the boys in the morning suits on Sussex Drive.

So at this point, it might be good to hear from somebody in the trenches, one man who is Jewish and who isn't a top official.

Aharon Mayne is a foreign service officer who has worked in the department since 1972. His life is his work. He lives less than a block away from his job. He is, by his own description, "religious" and wears his kippah proudly at work. He also does his work very well and has maintained his infectious sense of humor through the years.

Yes, there is discrimination but it's against "visible" Jews, he says, which he happens to be, and he tells an anecdote to illustrate his point:

"One time when [then] prime minister Yitzhak Rabin was coming to visit the department, I went downstairs to see him arrive.

"I was standing around talking to a rabbi and a colleague, who has done well for himself, (who also happens to be Jewish) quickly began to leave as soon as we told him who was coming."

Mayne asked him to stay.

"'Oh, no, no, I can't,' he replied as he rushed off.

"It would have been indiscreet of him to stay," chuckles Mayne.

It's being "openly" Jewish that bothers them, Mayne says. "They would prefer you would keep it quiet. The only religion that is supposed to exist around here is career."

Mayne once saw his performance appraisal report and discovered that it read "Not suitable for Israel."

"They should have simply stamped a Star of David and been done with it," chuckles Mayne, who says he is one of those Jews who has been told to his face he would not be posted to Israel.

"When it comes to the treatment of visible Jews around here, none is still too many," quips Mayne.

He has noticed that "a guy who is Indian has gone to India," and there is no problem sending Canadians born in Ukraine, France, England, Ireland and many other countries back to their countries of origin as Canadian diplomats.

But Jews born right here in Canada? No, never, unless they are political appointments such as Spector, or the current ambassador to Israel, former Liberal MP David Berger.

Nor is there discrimination against sending Jews to represent Canada in other countries, Latin America, Africa, Asia, says Mayne.

"Thank God there are places where they can send Jews," laughs Mayne, sarcastically.

THE HEARTBEAT OF BAYCREST

The people of Baycrest.
The clients, the community, the staff and the volunteers, make up the heart of Baycrest.

Going beyond the expected and adding quality to life is a part of the tradition and history at Baycrest.

Marti Lodge

initiated Pet Therapy at Baycrest 8 years ago. Over the years, Alfie, Freddie, Shadow, Herbie and Moby have warmed the heart and brought smiles to patients in the continuing and palliative care units of the hospital.

"Every Monday morning from 10:30 to 12 noon, when the Pet Volunteers arrive, it's the most wonderful sight to see the clients' faces light up. Particularly in palliative care, the friendly softness of a loving, tail wagging dog seems to bring enormous comfort. These animals give a special kind of love and acceptance, and when they can't come for one reason or another, everyone's terribly disappointed. It's hard to quantify how much good a pet program does. But it works, we see it. Thanks to our dedicated volunteers, every Monday morning, for the past eight years."

Doing whatever it takes to add to the quality of life.

Baycrest, our future is the community.

Spector appointed publisher of the Jerusalem Post

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Norman Spector, who will take over as president and publisher of the Jerusalem Post May 1, says he will spend several months getting a feel for the country and the paper's role in Israeli politics before making any changes.

In time, though, he expects the Post, which has made a sharp turn to the right since it was purchased by Canadian Conrad Black in 1989, may "very well find itself in the mainstream" of Israeli public opinion.

Spector will also make development of the Post's international edition a priority. "I want to increase its subscriptions and advertising and further develop the French-language edition and the Internet edition, and maybe launch a Spanish edition," he said in a telephone interview.

Spector, a 47-year-old bachelor, will replace Yehuda Levy. Another Canadian, Hollinger Inc. executive David Radler, remains chairman of the board.

Spector, who was ambassador to Israel from February 1992 until August 1995, after serving as then prime minister Brian Mulroney's chief of staff, insists Hollinger Inc.'s offer to head the Post came as a surprise. "I was not on the job market," said Spector, who has been vice-president (corporate affairs) of Imperial Tobacco since August. He will leave that position in a few weeks.

"I'm not at all unhappy [at Imperial] and I thought carefully about the offer, but I feel it is an opportunity I couldn't miss," he said.

The change of career, from the Canadian corporate boardroom to publishing a newspaper abroad, is not as radical as it may appear, he said.

"It's true I've never been a journalist, but I know the territory [Israel], so to speak, and speak the language [Hebrew and some Arabic], and I've had a bit of involvement with writing through my column in the Globe and Mail."

He is also confident his years as a political insider have equipped him with the skills needed to analyse the complexities of government, here or elsewhere.

Asked how he thinks Israelis will react to a Canadian taking the Post position, Spector replied: "I'm well known to Israel's leaders and many of the people. I think they have confidence in me."

Orthodox shul launched in Victoria

By MAURICE LUCOW
Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — An Orthodox synagogue, Congregation Aish Hatorah, has been launched in Victoria.

The synagogue holds Shabbat services every two weeks at the Jewish Community Centre, using a Torah borrowed from Congregation Emanu-El, Victoria's Conservative synagogue and siddurim provided by Congregation Schara Tzedeck in Vancouver. There is no rabbi or cantor. The Torah is kept at Emanu-El and transported to the centre on the Friday afternoon before a service.

So far, the congregation has no affiliation with any national or international group.

Arnie Niederhoffer, one of the organizers of the congregation, told The CJN that about 30 families attend services regularly. At holiday times attendance has surpassed 40 to 50 congregants. The operation, he said, "is being run on a shoestring," but a formal dues structure will be determined at a meeting late in January "and the business of the congregation will proceed."

Some members have come from Emanu-El, while others, who have not been affiliated with a shul, said they were not comfortable in Conservative traditions, said Niederhoffer. "There was no rift between the congregations, just a difference of opinion over what kind of worship ritual should be used," he added.

Niederhoffer believes that as Victoria's Jewish population expands, the community will be large enough to support two denominations.

Services are conducted by knowledgeable members, of which there are several in the congregation. There are no plans to look for a rabbi, or to put up a new building. Nor are there any campaign plans to raise funds, he said.

Children of Aish Hatorah members continue to use the Hebrew school facilities of Emanu-El, and the two congregations will work closely together, says Steve Feldman, Emanu-El's president. His shul is currently trying to raise $2 million to build a school and offices on a property adjoining the present 134-year-old synagogue, which is in the heart of downtown Victoria.

No negotiations over Golan: Bibi

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Golan Heights must remain in Israel's hands because of its strategic, historic and economic importance, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told a French newspaper.

The future of Jerusalem, too, "will never be negotiated," the Paris daily Le Figaro quoted Netanyahu as saying in an interview published Saturday.

But Netanyahu also said he could envision a Palestinian state, provided the term "state" is carefully defined to protect Israeli interests and security.

"We neither want to govern them nor interfere with their existence," the newspaper quoted him as saying. "But we do not wish to find ourselves in a position that threatens our lives and our future."

Asked whether the future of the Golan Heights is negotiable, Netanyahu replied: "Absolutely not. We have to keep the Golan for strategic, historic and economic reasons.

"Why should we abandon our water resources? We can live without petroleum, but we can't deprive ourselves of water," Netanyahu said.

In Damascus, a Syrian official reiterated Damascus' demand that Israel accept the principle of withdrawing from the Golan Heights before talks resume between them.

"The talks will not resume until the current Israeli government accepts the principle of full withdrawal from the Golan Heights to the pre-war June 4, 1967, border lines," one official told Reuters.

Meanwhile, Syrian Vice-President Abdel-Halim Khaddam returned home from Cairo after talks with Egyptian leaders on how to boost Arab solidarity, officials said. Khaddam was accompanied by Foreign Minister Farouk Shara. Syrian officials said that Khaddam, who met President Hosni Mubarak during the visit, "discussed the Arab situation and means of reactivating joint Arab action."

In an implicit reference to the Hebron deal, Damascus' state-run radio said that by signing the deal, Netanyahu was trying to delude the world and show that he is a man of peace.

Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai said he expects the peace negotiations with Syria to resume shortly, now that the Hebron redeployment has been carried out.

"I hope that within a very short time we will have a new situation where the leader of Syria and the leader of Israel can sit together, discuss the subject and find a solution for the problem," Mordechai said.

Speaking to reporters while monitoring the first day of IDF redeployment in Hebron, Mordechai said Israel was interested in returning to the negotiating table.

"Every day we are asking President [Hafez al-]Assad and the government of Syria to come forward to continue the negotiations and to find a solution for the problem between Israel and Syria," Mordechai said.

U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher called on Netanyahu earlier to test Syria's willingness to make peace.

In a farewell interview, Christopher said Netanyahu's agreement with Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat to withdraw Israeli troops in the West Bank could prompt an accord with Syria.

"He's crossed an important threshold," Christopher said.

He compared Netanyahu's dealings with Arafat to a similar transformation by Yitzhak Rabin, who cut two deals with Arafat and shook hands with him on the White House lawn.

Christopher complimented Netanyahu for dealing with Arafat.

"The prime minister has recognized a need for pragmatism in the situation," Christopher said.

On all fronts, he said, "there is no doubt this will improve the relationship between Israel and the rest of the Arab world."

Arab countries will be encouraged by Netanyahu's acceptance of a road map for a pullback in Hebron and elsewhere on the West Bank, Christopher said.

Sharon renews call for national unity government

By SARAH HONIG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon renewed his call for a national unity government.

Sharon has been advocating a broad coalition for several months and has been holding regular meetings with Labor leader Shimon Peres.

Around Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, however, Sharon's latest pronouncement was doused with cold water. In the Likud it is argued that Sharon's remarks stem from his increasing frustration inside the government, including not being consulted about the Hebron agreement.

Speaking on Channel 1 and 2 weekend newsreels, Sharon said, "A broad coalition could prevent a situation in which essentially one man decides. It doesn't matter who the man is. It's nothing personal."

Sharon argued, "It would be highly desirable, if possible, to reach a broad national consensus in which, admittedly, no side would be able to realize all of its objectives. The problems ahead are even more difficult and complex than what we have just come through."

Sharon was apparently hinting at the scheduled mid-March beginning of the permanent status talks, where presumably the government would have an easier time resisting excessive Arab demands if it could count on broad support.

Sharon expressed the hope that he "would take a greater part in the coming negotiations. I had not been made party to the policy-making thus far and I feel that had I been part of the team we could have come up with a far better deal, with greater security for Hebron's Jews. I am convinced that Jews must be in Hebron or there would be no access to the Machpela Cave, to the ancient cemeteries and to other Jewish holy sites."

Swiss panel to examine destruction of bank documents

By BATSHEVA TSUR
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Swiss banking experts and government officials will be invited to attend a meeting of the international commission looking into dormant Jewish assets in Swiss banks. The subject will be the destruction of documents at the Union Bank of Switzerland (UBS).

Commission Chair Paul Volcker notified the six commission members that the meeting will be held at the end of this month in Zurich.

In a letter to Jewish Agency Chairman Avraham Burg, Volcker said he has been in contact with both the Swiss Bankers Association (SBA) and Swiss government officials regarding a possible breach of the understandings between the Jewish organizations and the SBA. A joint effort, he said, will be made to expose all information regarding accounts of Holocaust victims.

Volcker stressed that, if indeed documents had been destroyed at the UBS, this would be a violation of legislation recently adopted by Switzerland on efforts to reveal the fate of Jewish funds deposited in that country during the Holocaust period.

According to media reports earlier this month, UBS, Switzerland's second largest bank, sent documents for shredding which allegedly contained information on deposits made by Holocaust victims. Burg then wrote to UBS President Mathis Cabiallavetta with a request that he reveal immediately all information relating to the deposits. According to the reports, UBS had the names of some 2,600 Jewish account holders, whose deposits are worth hundreds of millions of dollars, but this list has reportedly disappeared together with the monies.

For their part, UBS heads have asserted that the banks held only $34 million belonging to Jews killed in the Holocaust.

Jewish organizations have uncovered documents indicating that UBS also stored valuable art works — looted from Jewish families — for the Nazis. These included masterpieces by Van Gogh and Cezanne, among others.

Documents found by the Jewish organizations purportedly reveal the transfer of large sums of monies from UBS to the Nazis. One such document talks of a sum, equivalent to $150,000, "provided to the enemy" by UBS during a two-week period during World War II.

Burg, who is one of the six commission members, said that it was essential that an auditor and investigators appointed by the commission enter each of the Swiss banks to hold spot checks. "We will go from bank to bank until we discover exactly who destroyed how much and when," he said.

Ties with U.S. improve

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Last week, after three months of arduous negotiations, Israel and the PLO finally signed the much-delayed Hebron agreement. It is important for several reasons.

It is the first tangible expression of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's resolve to proceed with the Oslo peace process, which he had belittled before last May's general election.

It will strengthen Netanyahu's evolving partnership with PLO chieftain Yasser Arafat and thereby increase the level of trust between Israel and the Palestinians, which had fallen to a nadir of late.

It will have a salutary effect on Israel's ties with Egypt, Jordan and the Gulf states, which had accused Netanyahu of dragging his feet.

It will improve Netanyahu's relations with President Bill Clinton, who had been increasingly impatient with the thrust of his policies.

The United States, the prime mover of last week's breakthrough, had been pushing hard for a Hebron accord and, at Arafat's insistence, for a " road map" setting out the parameters of Israel's next three withdrawals from rural areas in the West Bank.

The negotiations, which are supposed to settle this unfinished business, left over from the 1995 Oslo 2 pact, will be extremely difficult and will test everyone's mettle to the fullest. But for now, Israel can breathe a sigh of relief that its bilateral relations with the United States, which had eroded since Netanyahu's accession to power, seem to be back on track.

Judging by his first meeting with Clinton at the White House last July, Netanyahu did not get off to a good start with him. Clinton was unable to extract from Netanyahu a promise not to build new settlements in the territories, nor could he coax from him a date for an Israeli redeployment from Hebron.

Clinton, upon conferring with Netanyahu, declared that "the historic relationship between the United States and Israel...will not change." But having said that, Clinton, who had established a reputation as the most pro-Israel U.S. president in history, issued a veiled warning. "The tide of history cannot be turned back." he said pointedly, referring to the need for pressing ahead with the Oslo process.

Warren Christopher, Clinton's secretary of state, sounded a similar theme when he visited Jerusalem shortly after Netanyahu's installation as premier. " Real peace without security is not possible, and real security without peace is also impossible," he observed.

During the first months of Netanyahu's tenure, the Clinton administration gave him the benefit of the doubt. Clinton voiced optimism that Netanyahu was committed to pursuing peace, while Christopher urged Arab states not to " prejudge" his government.

The Clinton administration's faith in Netanyahu was misplaced on two counts.

First, Netanyahu rejected a U.S. request to close, even temporarily, a new entrance to the Hasmonean tunnel in Jerusalem. As Palestinians rioted, Clinton said that both sides should refrain from needless provocations. In response, Netanyahu said that while he valued America's friendship, he was more concerned with preserving Israel's claim to Jerusalem.

Second, Netanyahu announced that financial incentives would be restored to settlements in the territories. This prompted Clinton, who had never publicly criticized Israel's policies, to scold Israel. The settlements, he said in no uncertain terms, were " absolutely" an obstacle to peace, preempting the outcome of final status talks.

Clinton's fundamental dispute with Netanyahu over the future of the settlements has not dissipated with the successful conclusion of the Hebron negotiations. But in the afterglow of Israel's agreement with the Palestinians, Netanyahu has been given a second chance to mend his relations with Clinton, whose inaugural on Jan. 20 ushered in his second term as president.

Israel seeking lucrative Polish military contracts

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Defence officials are hopeful that a delayed meeting held on Friday between Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai and his Polish counterpart in Jerusalem paved the way for lucrative Polish military contracts.

Mordechai met with visiting Polish Defence Minister Stanislaw Dobrzanski prior to heading to Hebron to supervise the first day of IDF redeployment there. The meeting was to have taken place the day before, but Mordechai canceled it to be in the Knesset for the debate on the Hebron withdrawal. It was rescheduled only after Dobrzanski, who was accompanying Polish Prime Minister Wlodzimierz Cimoszewics, subsequently complained that Israeli politicians were ignoring him.

"Mordechai apologized and explained to him why he couldn't meet earlier, and he accepted that," said Kuti Mor, who is responsible for foreign relations at the Defence Ministry and accompanied Mordechai to the meeting. "The meeting ended with very strong optimism on both sides."

Dobrzanski told Mordechai he had visited ElOp and Elbit and was very impressed with the upgrading they had to offer and that Israel had a good chance of winning a contract to modernize Polish equipment, Mor said. Dobrzanski also invited Mordechai to visit Poland.

Poland, which is seeking membership to NATO, is interested in modernizing its military, but Dobrzanski admitted his country was facing difficult challenges due to its shortage of funds. Israeli officials said it was suggested that Israel and Poland work together to upgrade Polish equipment and include a third country to help cover costs.

"They spoke of business and Dobrzanski expressed optimism that even though matters are not closed, Israel was seriously being considered in any upgrades," Mor said. "But we are up against stiff competition."

A consortium of Israeli companies — Elbit, ElOp and Rafael — is bidding to upgrade the Polish Huzar helicopter, but is competing against the U.S. company Rockwell International Corp.

MKs urge boycott of station

By MICHAL YUDELMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Labor MKs Sunday called on their colleagues to boycott Arutz 7, the right-wing pirate radio station, and will try to stop Labor Party chairman Shimon Peres from giving an interview to the station next Sunday.

An interview with Labor leadership candidate MK Ehud Barak broadcast on Arutz 7 Sunday triggered angry protests from Labor MKs and others on the left, who called on MKs to curb their "microphone lust."

Labor MK Eitan Cabel sent a letter to all the party's MKs urging them to refuse to give interviews or cooperate in any way with the station, because it is operating illegally and incited against the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Cabel spoke to Barak, who told him that he had been asked to appear on Eitan Danzig's program, Interview of the Week, some seven months ago. Barak finally agreed to do it, in an attempt to address listeners not likely to be identified with Labor.

"We don't want to exclude any sector of the public," a source close to Barak said, noting that Labor lost last year's elections because it had no connection to certain parts of the population. Speaking on Arutz 7 does not mean one agrees with them, the source added, noting that many Labor leaders have been interviewed on the station, including Ori Orr, Uzi Baram, Dalia Itzik, and Peres himself.

Itzik, head of Labor's response team, admitted she was in a dilemma concerning Arutz 7, which had branded Rabin a "traitor." She said she would try to convince Peres not to do the interview, which is scheduled to be broadcast next Sunday.

"Peres has been the target of such tirades of hatred and bitterness from that station and there is no reason for him to be interviewed there," she told Israel Radio.

As for her own appearance on Arutz 7, Itzik said, "Until the elections and for a long time afterwards I refused to cooperate with the station. Last week I broke down and gave them an interview, because I thought it was wrong to abandon their listeners to the station's wild incitement."

She said Labor, when it was in power, failed to close the illegal station "because they were afraid of the public represented by that station and no one dared mess with them. Maybe Cabel is right and we should boycott the station until they clean up their act."

Meretz leader MK Yossi Sarid blasted "the shameful interviews" given by Labor MKs to Arutz 7.

"Labor's MKs should stop looking for excuses to justify speaking on Arutz 7, a subversive channel trying to acquire an air of legitimacy," Sarid said.

Suicide studies chair launched at U of T

TORONTO — Among young adults in Canada, suicide is the most common cause of death after motor vehicle accidents.

The first university position in North America dedicated to suicide research, the Arthur Sommer Rotenberg Chair in Suicide Studies has been established at the University of Toronto. Dr. Paul Links of the university's Department of Psychiatry will be the first incumbent.

Links will lead research on suicide, one of the leading causes of death for people under 35 years of age. Every year in Canada, approximately 3,500 people take their own lives and thousands more attempt suicide.

Links is clinical program director-medical and deputy chief of psychiatry of the Wellesley Central/St. Michael's Hospital's joint Mental Health Service, where he will continue the clinical work crucial to his research. Prior to joining U of T in 1994, he was professor of psychiatry at McMaster University. He has served as a council member with Ontario Psychiatric Association and is currently president-elect.

He has published over 50 articles in scientific journals and two books relating to his research on persistently suicidal individuals.

Under his leadership, the research group will focus on clarifying the cause of suicide and suicidal behaviors and developing effective interventions and preventative strategies.

Arthur Sommer Rotenberg, a Toronto physician and graduate of U of T's Faculty of Medicine, took his own life in 1992 at the age of 36 following a long struggle with bipolar affective disorder (manic depression).

The initiative to fund a chair in suicide studies in Rotenberg's name was led by his mother, Doris Sommer Rotenberg. The fundraising committee for the chair raised $1 million in cash and pledges, with U of T matching the private funding to cover the full cost of $2 million.

New book helps young brain tumor patients, parents discuss concerns

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Doris Rosenberg used to feel awkward about entering a child's hospital room for the first time and introducing herself as a social worker, a term with which many children are unfamiliar.

As a staff member of the Hospital for Sick Children's neurosurgery department from 1988 to 1994, Rosenberg, who now has a private practice, came up with the idea of the "talking lady" to explain her role.

Now Rosenberg and her husband Elliot, a Toronto lawyer, have published The Talking Lady Presents: Having a Brain Tumor, a book written by Doris to help young brain tumor patients and their parents discuss their concerns.

Her idea of writing the book began about half a dozen years ago with a fruitless search for child-oriented material for her patients. "I made a few phone calls in Canada and to the United States. Nobody had anything. In fact, I was told if I had anything, to send it down to them."

Rosenberg, a native of Montreal and a graduate of McGill University, was also influenced by the memory of her sister, Terry Belle Klein, to whom the book is dedicated. Klein, who died in 1988, was born with physical and mental handicaps and developed Crohn's disease in her teens.

"Helping her certainly influenced me in terms of helping others. She was probably one of my first patients. I remember her all the time."

Having a Brain Tumor, colorfully illustrated by Toronto artist Tom Mortensen, is a 48-page workbook/storybook with places for children to draw their feelings, wishes and fears so they don't become "locked [in]. It provides a strong measure of hope [to] talk about these things and not fall apart."

Doris Rosenberg

The book is "unique in its interactive presentation," said Eleanor Pask, executive director, Candlelighters Childhood Cancer Foundation Canada. It should be read with a parent or professional, she advises. "It opens an avenue for discussion."

Providing opportunities to talk is key, said Rosenberg, 43. "You don't ever force anybody. Sometimes it happens that they're quiet, and that's okay. Everyone is different."

In North America, approximately 5,000 children a year "from every ethnic background" are diagnosed with a brain tumor in North America, she said. The characters in Rosenberg's book, including a boy named Avrum, reflect the diversity.

The Rosenbergs, parents of a preschooler, have attended three brain tumor conferences in recent months to promote their new publication. Elliot, in addition to editing and publishing the first run of 5,000 copies under the name Talking Lady Press, also tracked down corporate sponsors like the "angels" they found at Kodak Canada and Batten Graphics to help underwrite the cost of publication.

To their initial surprise, some of the people they met felt the book might also be useful for healthy children who have family members with brain tumors.

As the book's author, Rosenberg shed a few tears and shared hugs with some of the people she met at the conferences. "It's a different way of connecting with people. When you're working as a professional [social worker], you give of yourself but you don't share."

Future plans for the Rosenbergs include writing and publishing more books addressing the psychological needs of children with various medical conditions, as well as more generic children's books.

Business student a talented artist

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Multi-faceted 19-year-old York University student Limore Twena, who combines a business administration program with an elective in painting, presents an exhibition of oils on canvas, called Life Through Colour, through to Jan. 23 in the Student Centre Gallery (next door to the Underground), 4700 Keele St. W.

"It's not usual for a business student to be a painter as well," Twena says, but this collection confirms that her art is very much a part of who she is.

The Bride, an adaption from her mother's wedding photo, is all brightness and anticipation, strong turquoise, yellow, orange — not traditional bridal tones, yet joyful. One concession to tradition is the white blossom head-dress that suggests the expected stability of marriage.

Twena's paintings delineate figures and faces against a generally abstract or impressionistic background. She does not plan them in detail. "That way I'm more free, spontaneous," she says.

But each one says something.

Conflict, two arresting blue figures crouched in front of a cave filled with flames, reveals each individual's response to the other through body language. The first reaches out; the second withdraws behind folded arms.

There is a similar duality in much of what Twena does.

Pregnancy focuses on a young woman looking over her swollen belly, big eyes reflecting a certain apprehension mixed with acceptance.

The Obstacle examines another kind of split. A man and woman are poised on top of a Grecian flower urn but there are no flowers. He is seated, "stuck," says Twena, "perfectly satisfied to be exactly where he is, not wanting to change." But their relationship has become stagnant. She stands with one foot out; she wants to leave, to move on.

"We have to go forward or we regress," Twena says. Certainly she is constantly moving forward.

Twena studies business administration for practical reasons. In a global economy the computer is the future, she maintains, and she is determined to be part of that future. Already she has worked part time with an Internet company making WEB pages.

However, she has other interests. For 13 years she studied dance, ballet and jazz. She continues to study voice, including opera.

A graduate of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, she is involved in Jewish and Hebrew performance — in the recent Jerusalem 3000 musical, Caravan and an annual Bet Halochem film program. She has entertained at Baycrest, singing in Hebrew and Yiddish. Patients have got up and danced to the familiar melodies. "That made me feel good." she says.

Three years ago, Twena participated in the March of the Living. And she accompanies her grandfather, Henry Melnick, a Holocaust survivor originally from Poland, when he lectures on his experiences. She very much wants to carry on for him some day.

With all this, what are her plans for the future?

"I don't really know," she says, but she definitely expects to use her business training — "the possibilities are endless."

"And I'll know how to market my own paintings," she adds.

Canadian McCarthyism subject of documentary

By CINDY WAXER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — During the McCarthy era, my zayde was prohibited from boarding a flight to St. Louis by airport security officials. After retaining a lawyer to resolve the matter, he discovered that his father had once donated $2 to a Communist publication. My zayde was therefore stigmatized as a security risk.

But the question remained: How did the Canadian government learn about an innocuous charitable donation to a Yiddish newspaper?

The documentary, The Un-Canadians, answers this question and many more. Scheduled to air on Jan. 29 at 9:00 p.m. on Cityty, the program reveals the activities and confidential documents of the "Security Panel," a secret government agency which, along with the RCMP security service, developed a Canadian blacklist during the Cold War.

Approximately one million Canadians, many of whom were Jewish immigrants, were added to this list of alleged subversives.

Director Len Scher's father was one such blacklisted man. Having arrived in Canada after surviving the Holocaust, Morris Scher, a Montreal tailor, was prohibited from boarding a flight to Israel and denied Canadian citizenship for many years.

While researching his father's plight, Scher, an investigative journalist, unearthed the stories of those who, like his father and my zayde, had been targeted by the Security Panel as national security threats. His findings are recorded in his book The Un-Canadians for which his documentary is named.

in-depth interviews, Scher's documentary relates the stories of blacklisted peace activists, civil servants and union workers whose activities comprised over 800,000 files gathered by the RCMP. Interestingly, many of these files chronicled the lives of Jewish people whose roots were in the Soviet Union, many of whom, after immigrating to Canada, still subscribed to its leftist ideologies.

"If you hated Communists and you were a former Nazi sympathizer, or even a Nazi war criminal, you could get into this country before anybody with left-wing sympathies and somebody who was Jewish," says Scher.

Among the Jewish blacklistees in The Un-Canadians is Rabbi Abraham Feinberg whose leftist activities earned him the nickname of the Red Rabbi.

A peace activist and co-founder of the Toronto Disarmament Network, the film uncovers how Rabbi Feinberg was under RCMP surveillance for approximately 40 years.

In addition to examining the life of Rabbi Feinberg, Scher interviews Dan Daniels, a Montreal journalist and former Communist. Expressing his feeling of having being violated, Daniels reveals how the red squad of the Quebec provincial police raided his Montreal apartment and confiscated his personal letters, books and manuscripts.

And then there is Leo Orenstein, a writer and former employee of the CBC who learned of being blacklisted when he was denied a guaranteed promotion by CBC executives on the grounds that he was a security risk.

Subsequently, Orenstein met with the RCMP, who questioned him for four hours about his family's roots in the Soviet Union, his father's affiliation with the socialist Workman's Circle and his own involvement in Communist youth groups. Eventually, Orenstein cleared his name, but the residual effects of being blacklisted still persist.

"I didn't want anything in my history to affect [my sons] adversely. And so I was a little concerned about that, because I feel that this thing could happen again...and so I checked with my children first before I was interviewed by Len Scher."

Yet despite the fears that the making of The Un-Canadians evoked, the documentary has enabled Scher to tell his father's story.

IMF adds Israel to the 'Ivy League'

BY DAVID HARRIS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The International Monetary Fund (IMF) has decided to add Israel to its list of industrialized countries, commencing in April, the Bank of Israel announced last week.

The central bank said it hopes the listing will help Israel's chances of improving its international credit rating and general economic standing, which is also dependent on the country's future macroeconomic policy and performance.

Currently, Israel is credit rated A3 by Moody's Investors Service and A minus by Standard and Poor's. The higher Israel's credit rating, the less interest it has to pay in raising money on foreign bonds markets.

The decision to include Israel in the list was taken after the central bank called on the IMF to rethink the country's status.

The IMF informed the bank the decision was taken in light of the ongoing accelerated changes in the economy.

South Korea, Singapore, Hong Kong and Taiwan have also been added to the IMF's "Ivy League" states, a list which until now included 23 countries, headed by the United States, Japan and Germany.

The standard of living, together with economic and financial market development, were given as the reasons for the inclusion of the five states.

Cabinet approves structural reforms

BY DAVID HARRIS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israel's cabinet recently unanimously approved the vast majority of the Treasury blueprint for structural reforms in the public sector.

Eighteen recommendations were accepted of the 25 formulated by the budget department. The remaining measures were still being discussed.

Among the proposals approved were:

• Opening public transportation to competition, which according to Finance Minister Dan Meridor would lead to cheaper fares.

• A public committee to examine the possibility of raising retirement ages for men and women. Finance Ministry spokesperson Eli Yosef denied media reports that the cabinet was to consider increasing retirement ages for women to 65 and men to 70.

• Granting a third cellular telephone licence before the end of June.

• Establishing a satellite television network.

• Opening new gasoline stations throughout the country. National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon said at least 250 are urgently required.

• Reforming the Standards Institute, so that it only has responsibility for essential checks such as health, safety and security.

Italian classic one of the best Holocaust movies

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

It's hard to imagine, but nine international distributors once dismissed The Garden of the Finzi-Continis as "a small, ethnic film." So much for their judgment.

Little did they know that it would be recognized as one of the finest films of the Italian cinema and as one of the best movies ever made about the Holocaust.

Twenty-five years after its release, The Garden of the Finzi-Continis is back in circulation, having been restored and fitted with Dolby stereo sound. It opens on Jan. 24 at the Cineplex Odeon Carlton theatre.

Having seen the original, I wondered how I would react to the new version. It is not as deceptively powerful the second time around, but happily, it is still quite impressive, richly deserving its accolade as an Academy Award winning production.

Directed by Vittorio De Sica, The Garden of the Finzi-Continis takes place in Ferrara, Italy, between the years 1938 and 1943, framed by the imposition of the first anti-Semitic laws enacted by the fascist regime and the deportation of Italian Jews.

Achingly beautiful at times, the film is largely set in the walled estate of the Finzi-Continis, a wealthy and refined Jewish family whose tree-lined luxuriant gardens insulate them from the spreading cancer of anti-Semitism.

As Jews are increasingly marginalized in Italian society, the Finzi-Continis open their palatial home to the friends of their children, the fetching Micol (Dominique Sanda) and her sickly brother, Alberto (Helmut Berger). Among the frequent visitors are Giorgio (Lino Capolicchio), a middle-class Jewish student infatuated with Micol, and Malnate (Fabio Testi), a Communist and the only non-Jew in their circle.

As metaphors go, the Finzi-Continis' garden is a perfect one. Here, amid the flaming flower beds, the stately trees, the languid tennis courts, the attentive household staff and the innocent twitter of birds, the ugly face of Benito Mussolini's anti-Semitic government seems far, far away, as if in another world.

But inexorably, the fascists close in. Jews are banned from the city's tennis clubs, universities and libraries. Micol wonders whether she will ever be able to resume her studies of the American poet Emily Dickenson. Giorgio is asked to leave a library.

Some Italian Jews, like Giorgio's father (Romolo Valli), a member of the governing fascist party, cannot grasp the enormity of the new era in Italian politics. In an argument with his son across the dinner table, he claims that Italy and Germany are as different as night and day and cannot be compared.

In a wink to the viewers, the level-headed Giorgio disagrees, signalling his father's blindness.

It is an instructive scene. During the 1920s and 1930s, Italian Jews flocked to the fascist party in disproportionate numbers, never realizing that Mussolini would adopt an anti-Semitic program and thus betray them. Giorgio's father, who becomes more disillusioned with his lot as The Garden of the Finzi-Continis progresses, is a prime example of the naivete which characterized much of the Italian Jewish community in those days.

The Garden of the Finzi-Continis is satisfying in all respects. The script, based on a semi-autobiographical novel by Giorgio Bassani, flows smoothy. The acting is naturalistic. The sets are magnificent. The musical score is both appropriate and heart-rending, particularly its rabbinic denouement.

I was not as moved by the film as I was in the early 1970s, when it triumphantly burst upon the scene. But it is still a touching testament of a family and of a time.

The Oxford Book of Hebrew Short Stories is a new survey of Hebrew prose in English, including pieces by classic and contemporary writers.

The Anthology of Hebrew Poems on the Theme of Peace, includes more than 80 poems spanning the modern period, and is set for publication by Viking/Penguin in 1997.

New Women's Writing From Israel includes stories in a wide range of styles, published by Frank Cass of Great Britain.

Gallimard Press in Paris is preparing to release two French-language anthologies, The Modern Hebrew Poem and The Modern Hebrew Short Story.

More On Waxman

• Congratulations to actor-director Al Waxman for being named as a member of the Order of Canada two weeks ago. An article on Waxman that appeared recently in these pages may need clarification, as several lines were inadvertently dropped.

As he directs Neil Simon's Lost In Yonkers which starts Feb. 4 at the Atlantis Theatre in Toronto, the former King of Kensington is gearing up to play Willy Loman in Arthur Miller's Death Of A Salesman at the Stratford Festival, opening in June.

The Toronto-based actor, who has appeared in hundreds of television shows and films, recently acted in The Rescuers, a made-for-TV movie co-starring Elizabeth Perkins and directed by Peter Bogdonavitch. Filmed recently in and around Toronto, the movie tells the story of "some non-Jews who helped Jews in the Holocaust." Waxman also recently acted in Critical Case, a film directed by Sidney Lumet due for a theatrical release next year.

"I've just finished two movies, I'm directing a play, and then I'm going into Stratford to act, so it's a rather enjoyable time for me," he said.

Few tangible traces left of Frankfurt's Jewish ghetto

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

FRANKFURT — At the end of the 19th century, Frankfurt's ghetto ceased being an exclusively Jewish neighborhood and passed into the mists of time.

The ghetto, home of the famous Rothschild banking family, was established in the mid-15th century and was closed by Napoleon's army in 1806.

Today, its only tangible traces are found in the basement of a municipal building opposite the old Jewish cemetery.

The foundation walls of five ghetto buildings, as well as the remains of two mikvahs and a waste water canal, can be viewed at the Judengasse museum on Konrad Adenauerstrasse in the heart of this bustling city, the financial centre of Germany.

Visitors who seek further insights into the history of Jews in Frankfurt – birthplace of the Holocaust memoirist Anne Frank and the sociologist Theodor Adorno – can head for the museum's bank of computers.

There, with a press of a key, you can access the names of virtually every Jewish person, some 33,000, who lived in Frankfurt prior to Hitler's accession to power in 1933.

The walled Jewish cemetery, which functioned between 1270 and 1820, was devastated by the Nazis. But inexplicably, they left scores of tombstones standing, including the weathered grave of Meyer Amschel Rothschild, the patriarch of the Rothschild clan.

The gray walls of the cemetery are embedded with approximately 11,500 small metal plaques in memory of the Frankfurt Jews who perished during the Holocaust. Installed this year, the plaques are engraved with the name of the victim and the place he or she was murdered.

Frankfurt, however, is not only a depository of the dead. Its Jewish community of 6,500 is growing, augmented in recent years by an infusion of Jews from the former Soviet Union. In all of Germany, there are 58,000 registered Jews, making it the third-largest Jewish community in Western Europe.

Frankfurt Jews are proud of their spacious, ultra-modern community centre on Savignystrasse, which opened in 1986. It is in the Westend, a sedate middle-class neighborhood favored by Jews before the Nazi era.

But dangers, real or imagined, lurk. A concrete barrier was recently erected in front of the building, a precaution taken by the police following the 1994 bombing of Buenos Aires' Jewish community centre.

Frankfurt is not the only city in Germany which may be of interest to a Jewish traveller.

Two cities in the former German Democratic Republic – Dessau and Erfurt – are also worth visiting.

Dessau – birthplace of the philosopher Moses Mendelssohn and the composer Kurt Weill – is a centre of Bauhaus architecture.

The original Bauhaus building, damaged during the war, still stands, having been renovated and reopened as a school in 1976. A bombing raid destroyed Moses Mendelssohn's house, but a plaque designates the site.

Kurt Weill's legacy is preserved in a restored Bauhaus building, the only documentation centre of his life and work in Europe. A Kurt Weill Festival is staged annually to coincide with his birthday on March 2, 1900. Weill, a cantor's son who is best known for The Three Penny Opera, was forced out of Germany in the early 1930s. The last remaining Jews of Dessau were deported in 1941.

Erfurt, the capital of Thuringia and of the eastern German horticultural trade, recently marked its 1,250th anniversary. It is a remarkably beautiful city of magnificent squares and historic half-timbered buildings, 32 of which stand on one of the longest covered bridge in Europe, the Kramerbrucke, which was finished in the 14th century.

Walk across it and you'll see the walls of a 15th century synagogue, exposed by an Allied bombing raid. Further on, in close proximity to a parking lot, are the remains of a mikvah and the ruins of a 19th century synagogue currently being restored as a Jewish-Christian centre.

Sheldon Kirshner travelled to Germany as a guest of the German National Tourist Office in Toronto.

Champion wrestler known for his optimistic attitude

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In his day, Morris Sobel could do 100 pushups, lead an exercise class and do dozens of those difficult "jackknife" situps. And that was in his late 70s.

As a younger man, Sobel was a champion wrestler, a phys. ed. trainer for police and pro sports teams and, most importantly, a mentsh who saw only the good in other people.

A longtime fixture at the Jewish Community Centre's (JCC) northern branch, Sobel died recently at the age of 82. He was remembered both for his astounding physical achievements and the good nature and positive perspective he brought when dealing with others.

"He had a tremendous reputation," said Archie Rottenberg, who knew Sobel for 50 years. "He had the ability, the patience and the personality that everyone responded to."

"He was well liked and well respected by all the members here," said Jim Emery, director of facilities of the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC), where Sobel worked out in his later years.

"He always encouraged people. He was always optimistic and happy. He got people to extend themselves with a helpful word," said Rabbi Wayne Allen, who delivered the eulogy at his funeral.

For many members of the JCC and the BJC after that, Sobel was the guy who ran the exercise class for the more "seasoned" members of the club. His style and techniques harkened back to a pre-aerobics age when that kind of workout was more commonly known as calisthenics.

"He made sure we were in shape," Rottenberg said, adding, "None of us could keep up with his exercises."

Sobel's fame as a well-conditioned athlete dates back to at least the 1940s. In 1942 and '46, he was Ontario heavyweight champ and in '46 was also Toronto and District Champion. A year later, he was crowned Whipper Billy Watson Heavyweight City Champion and in 1949 and '50, he coached the University of Toronto wrestling team.

In his late 40s, he and wife Diane moved to Calgary where they were in the hotel business. A physical fitness aficionado, Sobel continued to wrestle and remarkably, in 1962 he defeated the Alberta champion — a man 20 years younger — to win the Alberta heavyweight title.

During their Alberta hiatus, Sobel was called upon to whip the Calgary and Edmonton police forces into shape and his techniques were so prized that he was hired by the Calgary Stampeders to do the same with their football players.

After returning to Toronto a few years later, Sobel renewed his relationship with the JCC and served as athletic director, director of the men's health club and later, as an exercise instructor. He was instrumental in organizing the health club's holiday luncheons four or five times a year, when members would be treated to a meal and a discussion with a rabbi of the holiday's significance, Emery said.

Sobel was also a founding member of the Beth Tikvah Synagogue. From his seat on the right side of the sanctuary near the outside aisle, he was often called upon to lift the the Torah after it was read on Shabbat. From that he got his nickname, "Mr. Habgah," Rabbi Allen said.

Rottenberg, who met Sobel when both trained at the Brunswick Y, said Sobel's exploits earned him a writeup in Time magazine. Despite that acclaim, "he was never arrogant, never boastful. He was a community man who was known for his decency and his humility," Rottenberg said. "If any thing went well for anybody, he never begrudged them. He was not a jealous person... He always tried to find the good in people."

Top athletes honored

By TOM TUGEND
Special to The CJN

LOS ANGELES — Fourteen former athletes from six nations have been elected to the International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame.

They will be officially recognized in July at the organization's museum, housed in the Wingate Institute in Netanya, Israel.

The five American athletes are: Arthur Bluethenthal, Princeton University All-American in football, 1911-12; Milton Green, Harvard's world record-setting high hurdler, 1935-36; Solly Krieger, world middleweight boxing champion, 1938-39; Mort Lindsay, tenpin bowling pioneer champion, 1912-34; and Sid Tannenbaum, New York University's All-American in basketball, 1946-47.

Also named were Johan Harmenberg, Swedish world champion and Olympic gold medalist in epee fencing, 1980; Hans Haas of Austria, Olympic weightlifting gold medalist in 1928 and silver medalist in 1932; Pierre Darmon, France's No. 1 seed tennis player in the late 1950s and early '60's; and Sandor Gombos, Olympic and World Champion gold medalist in fencing from 1926-28.

Named in addition were five members of The Netherlands' women's gymnastics team, which won the first Olympic gold medal in the event at the 1928 games. They were Ana Polak, Helena Nordheim, Estella Agsteribbe, Judijke Simons and Elka de Levie. Except for de Levie, the gymnasts and their coach, Gerrit Kleerekoper, perished in the Holocaust.

To be honored with the Sports Hall's Pillar of Achievement Award are Margalit Sonnenfeld of Israel, coach of 76 medal winners in the Paralympics for disabled athletes, 1969-92; American William Lippy, founder and chair of the Israel Tennis Centres; and Murray Olderman, American sports writer and cartoonist.

Organizers pleased with seniors walk-a-thon

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — About 125 Jewish seniors and their families and friends turned out at the north Winnipeg Garden City Shopping Centre on Jan. 12, to Walk The Garden Path, an innovative walk-a-thon jointly sponsored by the Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre, a north Winnipeg seniors club, and the Sharon Home, the city's Jewish nursing home.

"It was an exercise that both of our organizations had been kicking around for years," says Phyllis Dana, secretary of the board of directors of the Gwen Secter Centre. "A joint venture was an appealing idea. There are no other joint programs like this in our community."

The walk-a-thon was an exercise in both fundraising and public relations. One of its objectives was to educate the public and heighten public awareness about seniors — from the active, well and fit who frequent the Gwen Secter Centre to the frail and elderly who make up much of the population of the Sharon Home.

Naida Rubin, the home's director of development, reports that 21 residents — some in wheelchairs or with walkers, some walking on their own — participated in the walk-a-thon accompanied by family members or companions.

"We anticipated that we would have 40 residents there," she says, "but the weather was so cold that we had to be careful with some of them."

Among the participants were centenarian Sarah Weisman and her daughter, Ros Silver, who were two of the honorary co-chairs of the event.

"It would have been better if I could have walked," says Weisman, a five-year resident of the home who has been using a wheelchair for the past two years. "Still, I have a mouth that can talk. The home needs the funding."

The walk-a-thon organizers also encouraged Jewish Winnipeg seniors who are currently in warmer climates to participate in Walk the Garden Path by walking wherever they were on Jan. 12.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My friend Cheryl, whom I have known for many years, is the cause of much anxiety for me. Cheryl and I grew up together, we did everything together including spending countless hours on the telephone.

Many years have gone by and although we both have families, she still loves to butchkeh (talk) on the phone. I however, would rather spend my limited spare time with my husband and kids.

When Cheryl calls, I try to get off the phone as politely as possible but I can't seem to hang up that easily. After telling her that I must go she usually says "OK, it was nice talking to you but just let me ask you one more question..." and the conversation continues. The kids nag at me to get off the phone so they can use the Internet (we only have one phone line) and sometimes I even get my husband to answer the phone and say that I'm not home. The whole thing is out of control and I am beginning to resent her. How can I cure this problem without losing a friend?

All Talked Out

Dear All Talked Out,

Sounds like this situation has gone a bit too far. Putting yourself and your family in a position where they need to lie for you is not acceptable.

What you need to do is have a good long talk with Cheryl, but not on the telephone. You can't speak calmly and reasonably when you have a child nagging at you to get off the phone and when you yourself are in an angry and resentful state.

Arrange for an evening out. When you are face to face and not under pressure you can explain to Cheryl that you are not a "phone person." Tell her that the time you have with your family is precious and you don't want to give that up to chat on the phone. Let her know that she is important and a good friend and that you are there for her if she needs you, but you simply can't spend your evenings chit chatting on the phone.

Hopefully Cheryl will understand that you have priorities and she will find someone else who shares her passion for the phone to take your place for those telephone marathons.

Readers may submit their questions to Ella at The CJN. But Ella is not a professional counsellor. She brings to the questions posed by readers her unique brand of earthy wisdom. Her advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

Israel demands PA amend charter

By EVELYN GORDON
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Palestinian Authority's (PA) failure to amend the PLO Covenant is a gross violation of the Oslo Accords, the government declared Sunday in an official statement by the Government Press Office (GPO).

According to the Prime Minister's Office, the statement was put out in response to the American "note for the record" accompanying the Hebron accord, which detailed unfulfilled Israeli and Palestinian commitments. Since the topics listed in this note are expected to be topics for negotiation in the coming months, the government considered it important to begin an information campaign on how the PA has violated its commitments and why rectification of the violations is crucial. Such a campaign is especially necessary with respect to the covenant, since much of the world, including the previous Labor government, accepted PLO Chair Yasser Arafat's claim that the covenant was changed last April.

The statement was prepared before Arafat's weekend interviews in Paris, in which he said he would not amend the charter until Israel adopts a constitution, according to an official in the Prime Minister's Office.

In its five-page statement, the GPO noted that amending the covenant to eliminate the numerous articles calling for Israel's destruction was

Canada anti-Israel in UN

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At last year's session of the United Nations General Assembly, Canada lined up with the majority and voted for resolutions generally critical of Israel.

Of 21 resolutions on the Middle East put before the UN, Canada supported 15 and abstained on five. In one instance, Canada and Israel backed the same resolution.

The resolutions, introduced by a coalition of Arab and Muslim countries, covered the Palestinian question, Jerusalem and the territories, Israeli settlements, a nuclear-free zone in the Middle East and Lebanon.

15 of 21 votes against; 5 abstentions

Canada's voting pattern appeared to reflect an increasing tendency to favor a European rather than an American perspective on the Arab-Israeli conflict, said David Goldberg, director of research of the Toronto-based Foundation for Middle East Studies.

Rodney Moore, a Department of Foreign Affairs spokesperson in Ottawa, disagreed with this assessment.

"We're not moving toward one group or another," he claimed, adding that the thrust of Canadian policy is to be "fair and balanced" to both sides.

In a similar vein, a Canadian diplomat at the UN, who preferred to remain anonymous, said that Canada's support for these resolutions was intended to bolster the current peace process in the Middle East.

Taking issue with this interpretation, Goldberg said the resolutions were unfair to Israeli interests, politicized debate on Arab-Israeli issues and represented a shift back to the days when the UN was reflexively anti-Israel, prior to Israel's rapprochement with the PLO.

"What we're seeing now, since the election of Benjamin Netanyahu as prime minister, is a return to more overt political resolutions," he said.

However, if the peace process produces concrete results on the Palestinian and Syrian fronts, the UN may well become " less overtly anti-Israel," Goldberg noted.

An examination of the resolutions highlights the problem.

CIFTA mission set to go

OTTAWA — International Trade Minister Art Eggleton will lead Canada's biggest-ever trade mission to Israel from Feb. 21 to 27.

Up to 70 Canadian business people could join Eggleton on the trip, set up to inaugurate the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement, (CIFTA) which came into force Jan. 1.

The delegation will explore the feasibility of joint Canada-Israel ventures and boosting Canada's exports to Israel.

Meetings with Israeli cabinet ministers are in the planning stages, Eggleton's office says.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Human Rights Act

VICTORIA — British Columbia's Human Rights Act officially became the Human Rights Code on Jan. 1.

Under the code, there will be two administrative entities: the Human Rights Commission and the Human Rights Tribunal. In addition, an advisory council of some 11 community members will bring public concerns to the commission and advise on human rights issues in the province. Canadian Jewish Congress Pacific region (CJC-P) regional director Erwin Nest said he expects CJC-P will be represented on the advisory council.

One of the four members of the tribunal is Barbara Humphreys, a member of Victoria's Jewish Community Centre.

Holocaust Writing Contest

TORONTO — The provincial writing contest on the Holocaust is being sponsored this year by Wanda D. Lerek, author of Hold On To Life, Dear, and the Holocaust Remembrance Committee of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

The subject is What are the lessons of the Holocaust for Canadians? The contest is open to all students in grades 7 to OAC and entries must be postmarked by March 1. Winners will be announced April 7. For more information call 416-631-5689.

ISRAEL

Israeli Contest

JERUSALEM — The Israeli Ministry of Education and Bar-Ilan University have announced an international study competition on Jewish identity, to be held in honor of the 100th anniversary of the first Zionist Congress.

The competition, which will be open to Jewish youths age 11 to 16, in both Israel and the Diaspora, will cover Jewish history, holidays and many other issues related to Jewish identity.

On Jerusalem Day, which falls in May, participating countries will select representatives, who will then compete in the finals in Basel, Switzerland — the site of the first Zionist Congress in 1897.

They will then travel to Israel for an educational seminar at Bar-Ilan University, scheduled for the end of June.

The three top winners will receive a scholarship for a future year of study at the university.

Those students wishing to compete must register by Feb. 15.

For more information, contact Benny Hager at the Jewish Agency for Israel, 110 East 59th St., New York, N.Y. 10022 or call 212-339-6071.

Settlement to Expand

JERUSALEM — Israel has approved the construction of 60 new housing units in a Jewish settlement in the Jordan Valley.

The move, which sparked criticism from Palestinian officials, came only days after Israel turned over most of the West Bank town of Hebron to self-rule.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu defended his government's approval of the private construction project in Ma'aleh Ephraim.

He added that Israel planned to continue expanding Jewish settlements in the West Bank.

NEWPORT BEACH – Judy Feld Carr of Toronto and Israel's ambassador to the United States, Eliahu Ben Elissar, will be among the featured speakers at the first North American Shaare Zedek Medical Center Conference, taking place here Feb. 16-19.

Deportation Ordered

NEW YORK – The United States has won a court order of deportation against New Jersey resident Ferenc Koreh, who worked as a propagandist during World War II in Nazi-allied Hungary and publicly advocated the persecution of Jews.

The U.S. government, however, agreed that it would not act to remove Koreh, 87, from the United States unless his rapidly deteriorating health improved. Koreh has a blood disorder and requires transfusions.

U.S. APPROVES PLANES FOR ISRAEL

Israel will be receiving 40 Phantoms and 80 Skyhawk supersonic aircraft in 1972, according to a report in Time magazine. Mrs. Golda Meir's visit to Washington was apparently a decisive factor, but the defeat of America's ally Pakistan has also, it is thought, contributed to advancing the date of resuming aircraft shipments to Israel.

MOVE TO FIRE EDUCATOR SPARKS ROW

A motion calling for the immediate dismissal of Rabbi Ben Hollander as director of the Beth Tzedec Synagogue's department of youth and education, has been deferred by the board of governors in the face of vigorous support of the rabbi on the part of many parents.

Instead of adopting the motion which was approved by the board's executive, the governors postponed action until after a congregational meeting to be held next month. At this time the entire synagogue's membership will vote on Rabbi Hollander's situation.

No specific charges were aired against Rabbi Hollander other than that he refused to acknowledge the authority of the board of governors on the issue of education policies.

CJC national office to stay in Quebec

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A controversial proposal to move Canadian Jewish Congress' (CJC) national office to Ottawa was a "non-starter" during the two days of meetings Jan. 18 to 20 in Toronto with the Council of Jewish Federations (CJF) Canada, president Richard Vineberg told The CJN.

"Nobody is interested in moving. CJC will not move," Vineberg said.

CJF-Canada's proposal to move CJC-national out of Quebec was one of several it had made. Some of the other proposals included selling off CJC's Montreal headquarters and merging CJC's Quebec, Ontario and Vancouver regions with their respective federations. As a result, CJC officials were gearing up for a showdown with their chief funder last week.

Vineberg made the proposals in a controversial November memo.

But according to Vineberg, anybody anticipating a Toronto showdown was in for a disappointment.

"There was a very good interchange of ideas," Vineberg said. "We had excellent meetings."

The issue of "merger," he said, "did not even come up," although much of the weekend discussion focused on how CJC regions and federations could "work more closely together."

The third major issue – the sale of CJC's headquarters in Montreal – also seemed less likely to occur since CJC had plans to offset the cost of maintaining the building by renting some of its offices to Jewish organizations, Vineberg indicated.

"CJC is looking at bringing people into the building," he said.

CJC president Goldie Hershon was pleased about the "healthy exchange" in Toronto and about the decision to keep CJC-national in Montreal. "I think moving out is now a dead issue," she said, although CJC's strategic planning committee is looking to enhance CJC-national's Ottawa presence.

Goldie Hershon

'Healthy exchange'

Hershon hoped that the CJC annual budget of $3 million would remain stable. It is already "[budgeted] at the bone," she said, and any further paring would necessitate cutting back staff.

Vineberg said federation campaigns have essentially remained "flat" across Canada.

In that light, he anticipated CJC's next budget, which has to be finalized by June, to be "give-or-take the same," although he did not specify how "give-or-take" would actually translate into dollars and cents.

Vineberg characterized the Toronto discussions, which broke up into three strategic planning sessions, as "productive," with the focus on how CJC regions and federations could "pool resources" and establish a "cooperative agenda" on such issues as small communities, Israel and community relations.

He said nothing "concrete" was decided because resolving such issues is an ongoing "process" and not something finalized at any one time.

In her remarks to the conference, Hershon spoke of CJC's attempt to "involve federation representatives at the national and regional levels in our decision-making process.

"We support close working relationships between lay and professional leadership in CJC and federations," she said. "We share the objective of being the best possible service to the Jewish community members, wherever they may reside."

Congress urged to reject restructuring attempts

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Attempts to structure the Canadian Jewish community on United States models should be resisted.

This was one of the messages sent to the Council of Jewish Federations (Canada) (CJF) by officers of the Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region at their meeting last week. The officers were reacting to the memo sent by CJF president Richard Vineberg in November to the national Congress office.

The main thrust of the region's Ontario officers' complaint was that the changes proposed by the CJF would impose a format for Jewish organizational life in Canada based on the U.S. model, where a multiplicity of voices speak for the Jewish community. This would effectively eliminate the CJC in its traditional role, the officers said.

"The essence of the situation is whether the CJC is to be independent or just another agency funded by the federation," region chair Moshe Ronen told a standing-room only meeting of the Ontario executive Jan. 23.

His officers' report said the federation has failed to raise enough money in Canadian Jewish communities to enable organizations to deliver services in education, social services, assistance to immigrants, or in the political realm.

"The federations can no longer fund the necessary services to the community and they recognize that they cannot fund its political activities. So they are trying to rationalize this by attempting to move into the latter realm and creating for themselves a raison d'etre that they never previously had and cannot fulfil, due to a lack of funds."

The executive meeting, attended by CJC president Goldie Hershon and three former presidents, passed a motion by a large majority affirming the need for an independent CJC, but asking for guidelines so that CJC and the federation can live and work together.

Mega-week in Ontario

The "mega-week" of legislative initiatives earlier this month by the government of Ontario was an aggressive, bold attempt to restructure the funding and the delivery of services to Ontarians.

In a consecutive, five-day staccato of ministerial announcements, which, as I wrote last week, "buried Ontarians like stones under a torrent of hot lava," the Progressive Conservative government of Mike Harris acquired $5.4 billion of primarily educational responsibilities from municipalities, and in turn, cast off onto the municipalities, $6.4 billion of primarily social housing, public health, special-care homes, welfare, child care and long-term health care responsibilities. Policing, transportation and library responsibilities were also transferred to the municipal level.

In a balancing of arithmetical ledgers, the government announced the creation of a $1 billion community reinvestment fund to fill the breach, as it were, when newly imposed municipal financial obligations exceeded municipal financial capabilities.

The centrepiece of the government's funding redesign was its proposal to reform the residential property tax system.

In its campaign to rearrange the duties between the province and the lower, more local tier of government, the province has fired an enormous fusillade of far-reaching, even historic, changes for the future of Ontario.

Though aggressive and bold, is the campaign wise? Is it right?

In typically candid form, the government has made no attempt to disguise the justification or the philosophical underpinning for the campaign. It wants to save money, to reduce the size of government, to become more "efficient." Saving money is the single most pressing policy objective, if not the raison d'etre of the government.

To be sure, saving money and cutting costs are worthy objectives. But should they be the only objectives, or the key driving objectives, as they seem to be, with this government? And is this the best way? Are the means appropriate to the ends?

No one can foretell the future, especially since neither the full financial nor operational details of the government's plans are fully known. But many policy analysts and economists are predicting that the impact of the "disentanglement" will be social and financial disaster for the large cities of the province and thus too, for the millions of people who live in them.

Even the Board of Trade of Metropolitan Toronto, the government's natural ideological ally, has rejected the attempted shift of duties. "The government is making a mistake in principle...We do not believe it is reasonable to hold local councils responsible for social services costs that arise from economic conditions over which they have little control," said George Fierheller, president of the board.

As Fierheller's reaction implied, absent in any of the ministerial announcements during volcanic mega-week was even the slightest reflection on the substantive propriety of shifting to the cities and municipalities, for now, half of the responsibility for social welfare services. Where was the discussion, if not the proof, that it makes good, not common, sense on the merits?

To which level of government - provincial or local – is the role of planning, funding, regulating, administering and maintaining the range of essential social welfare programs more appropriate, in principle? What does it say about the provincial government that it sees nothing wrong in casting aside its historic responsibilities without a widely-based, expert discussion on the matter?

'Peace, order and good government'

Since our very first days as a country, our governing ethos has been as distinctly Canadian as our mountains, our forests, our lakes and our streams, vastly and more poignantly different than, for example, our American neighbors.

Whereas the American founding ethos was based on "...life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," ours was based on "peace, order and good government."

The former rings a loftier, more stirring sound. But the real difference is not in the alliteration. It is, quite profoundly, in the focus and the effect of the words.

Every individual is unique, the bearer of immeasurable, infinite worth and entitled to equal rights and opportunities under the law. But the well-being and the safe-keeping of the community have a "higher" place in the hierarchy of values.

Ontario's Human Rights Code plainly acknowledges this hierarchy in its preamble even as it champions and protects the rights of the individual. "...so that each person feels a part of the community and able to contribute fully to the development and well-being of the community. (Our emphasis)

The development and well-being of the community has always been the first priority of government. But until quite recently, the extent of the community's well-being was never measured solely by the level of taxation or by the size of the bureaucracy. Of course, they are important factors and ingredients in assessing the community's well-being. But they are not the measure of it.

The community's well-being must be measured by the extent to which we fulfil the responsibilities of which we wrote last week, namely, to "the stranger, the orphan and the widow." As we wrote then, "we must not separate from the community." The obligation to help those who are in need is uncompromising. It is incumbent upon us all. It is the moral, the just and the proper way to behave.

Is the provincial government's policy – aimed at divesting itself of a great deal of those responsibilities primarily for the sake of saving money and not for the sake of better fulfilling that obligation – in keeping with "good government?" What message does it send to the needy, to the rest of the population, who look to government for guidance, leadership and example?

In the Canadian context, "good government" has always been measured by the extent to which the appropriate level of government showed direct, active concern for the miseries of others.

"Patoach tiphtach," you must open your hand to the needy, and, "naton titen," you must give them assistance."

It may be useful to look at Deuteronomy 21 for a sense of how "good government" might be defined in the context of the attempts by western governments worldwide, not only Ontario's provincial government, to cast aside historic responsibilities.

When an unknown person is found dead, the leaders of the community nearest to where his body was discovered must publicly proclaim "Our hands have not shed this blood, neither have our eyes seen it." The rabbis interpreted this declaration to mean that "No one came within our jurisdiction whom we discharged without food and whom we did not see and whom we left without providing an escort."

Nechama Leibowitz observed that the "concept of bloodshed was interpreted in a very broad manner to include even indirect responsibility for the death of a human being through neglect to attend to his elementary needs. The public as a whole and the community nearest to the slain and its elders are all responsible for the terrible deed committed in the field. Their whole way of life, their social order, economic educational and security institutions are answerable..."

There is no ambiguity.

It may be right for the provincial government to disentangle. But it is not right to disengage. Good government creates the conditions for economic progress; but economic progress is enhanced, not diminished, by humane, caring social welfare policies. MBD

Peace process gets new lease on life: Sultan

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Knesset ratification of the Hebron agreement by an overwhelming margin – 87-17 – gave the current Mideast peace process a new lease on life, Israel's ambassador to Canada, David Sultan, suggested last week.

The peace process, which is of "cardinal importance" to Israel, needed an unambiguous show of national unity for it to proceed, he told an audience at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

A 50 percent margin would not have been convincing enough, he noted, alluding to the passage of the 1995 Oslo 2 accord by just one Knesset vote.

Sultan implied that the pact, concluded by Benjamin Netanyahu and Yasser Arafat on Jan. 15, is an improved version of the Hebron agreement signed by the previous Labor government.

Firstly, it provides better security arrangements for Hebron's 450 Jewish inhabitants and, secondly, it re-establishes the principle of reciprocity.

Until recently, the newly installed envoy claimed, that principle had been largely overlooked, and the Palestinian side benefited from an "indulgent attitude" when not fulfilling their obligations.

Now the Palestinians will be expected to live up to their commitments by fully amending the PLO's national covenant, fighting terrorism and preventing incitement and acts of violence.

With the Hebron accord having been signed, Israel is presently negotiating "the framework and the terms" for future Arab-Israeli coexistence.

Sultan said that Israel's negotiating partner, the Palestinians, are perceived as weak, but in fact they "enjoy wide Arab and international support. All that makes present stages of the peace process difficult and sometimes an agonizing experience for us.

"But I am confident that at the end of the day, with your support and solidarity, we will achieve peace and security," he said, referring to the Diaspora.

In a speech largely devoted to Israel's ties with Jewish communities, Sultan said that mutual understanding and mutual respect should form the basis of the relationship.

"The question is how to make it less of an abstract expression and more of a tangible part of daily life."

Sultan said that Hebrew serves as a bridge between Israel and the Diaspora and contributes to Jewish continuity. "Hebrew is not merely a language but rather a culture," he said.

A Jew from the Diaspora can't really feel at home in Israel, or connect with the country, if he or she regards Hebrew as a foreign tongue, Sultan added.

Citing a study, Sultan said that Jewish continuity in the Diaspora depends on Jewish education and continuing links with Israel.

Turning to aliyah, Sultan made two points.

The majority of Jews do not live in Israel and are unlikely to move there any time soon. Nevertheless, the idea of aliyah, however impractical for some, should be transmitted by parents to children. It, too, fosters continuity.

Sultan, a senior diplomat who served as ambassador to Egypt before being posted to Canada, contrasted the warmth he has felt here with the atmosphere he found in Cairo.

Hebron the centre of Jewish history cycle: rabbi

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The city of Hebron, most of which is now under Palestinian control, is the centre of the cycle of Jewish history, asserts Rabbi Mordechai Becher.

"Hebron is where G-d made his covenant with Abraham; it is where David was anointed king of Judah and ruled for the the first seven years of his reign; and it will be where the Jews will be informed of the coming of the Messiah, he said.

Rabbi Becher was speaking at Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation in Thornhill. The rabbi was for several years senior lecturer at Ohr Somayach before he returned to Israel last fall.

Stressing that he was speaking as a rabbi and not as a politician, Rabbi Becher roamed through Jewish history to show the centrality of the beleaguered city.

Hebron, he said, the site of Me'arat Hamachpela, the cave of Machpela, is the first place that connects the Jewish people with the land of Israel. Along with the Temple Mount and Shechem, the tomb of Joseph, "we bought it — we didn't conquer it, steal it, or use pressure to get it — to show that our claim to it is above any type of criticism."

Abraham bought the cave of Machpela as a tomb for Sarah, and it later became the burial sites for himself, Isaac and Rebeccah, and Jacob and Leah, he said. (According to tradition, Adam and Eve are also buried there.)

Abraham paid an enormous price for it, Rabbi Becher said: 400 shekels, at a time when the average wage, according to the Code of Hammurabi, was six or eight shekels per year.

"Abraham knew, because G-d had told him, that he and Sarah and Isaac would have an impact on the entire world."

At the Temple in Jerusalem, he went on, where human beings reached the spiritual world, the priests looked towards Hebron to see when the sun rose, so that they could begin the daily sacrifices.

Similarly, it is the duty of a king to bring the spiritual and physical world together. "He is responsible for Israel running in such a way that not only its physical impact on the world, but the spiritual impact is calculated.

"Every war, every alliance, every action is based on how to bring Torah to the world."

The purpose of Israel, he said, is to follow the example of Sarah, who was buried in Hebron — to be a vehicle to bring the Torah and heaven to earth."

David, he said, was anointed in Hebron, because he was supposed to do the same thing on a communal level as Sarah did on an individual level.

The Me'arat Hamachpela is the only tomb mentioned in the Bible where someone went to pray, said Rabbi Becher."Caleb [one of the spies sent by Joshua to spy out the land] prayed there that the other spies wouldn't just look at the physical difficulties of conquering the land, but could see the spiritual possibilities."

Someone could have said the same thing in 1945, he added wryly, about the possibility of the establishment of a Jewish state.

The Jews, he said, have kept returning to Hebron."They were exiled by the Babylonians, and came back 70 years later. They were expelled by the Greeks and later by the Romans, and they came back."

The Turks didn't allow the Jews to live in Hebron for hundreds of years, he said, but Sephardic authors and representatives of Lithuanian yeshivot came there.

Muslims said Jews couldn't go up more than seven steps to the cave of Machpelah, but they did, he said, and built yeshivas there too.

Rabbi Becher recited more of the history of Hebron: Jews were massacred in 1929, and they came back; there was another massacre in 1936, and they came back. They were expelled in 1948 by Jordan, and came back in 1967 and built Kiryat Arba.

And most recently, a group of women and children moved into the Hadassah hospital in Hebron, and are still there, he said.

Caplan considering running for federal seat

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — Former Ontario health minister Elinor Caplan is considering seeking the federal Liberal nomination in the new riding of Thornhill in the next election.

If Caplan goes ahead, she'll join four others — including two veteran Vaughan councillors — who are seeking the nod for the federal Liberals in Thornhill.

Caplan, the Liberal MPP for Oriole, told The CJN she was approached by the federal Grit campaign to take a stab at Thornhill, a riding that won't exist until the national vote, expected later this year or early in 1998.

"It's a big decision. I'm seriously considering it," said Caplan, a 12-year Queen's Park veteran.

She downplayed the fact that she doesn't live in York Region, pointing out that she doesn't live in Oriole riding either. However, "no decision has been made yet."

No date has been set for the Liberal nomination. Insiders say it won't be later than this spring.

Thornhill will be among a few new and several redrawn federal ridings created as a result of Canada's increasing and shifting population. It will be bounded by Steeles Avenue, Highway 400, Rutherford Road and Highway 404. Its population will be about 95,000 and it's been estimated that it will be 25 to 35 percent Jewish, making it one of the most "Jewish" ridings in Canada.

Thornhill will be carved out of York North, currently held by Liberal Maurizio Bevilacqua, and Markham-Whitchurch-Stouffville, held by independent Jag Bhaduria.

Also seeking the federal Liberal nomination are Vaughan ward 5 councillor Bernie Green; ward 4 councillor Mario Racco; Frank Carnevale, a past president of the Ontario Young Liberals; and Doron Aronson, a 25-year-old former assistant to several members of Parliament and now an employee at the Foreign Affairs department.

Green, whose campaign is off to a quick start, says he has support from several multicultural groups, including Ohr Somayach, Chabad Lubavitch of Southern Ontario, Or Haemet Sephardic School and his own synagogue, Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation.

Fisch, 47, has served six years as a Thornhill ward councillor in Markham and two years as regional councillor. He's active in B'nai Brith and is a member of Darchei Noam Congregation.

Bill Fisch

Elinor Caplan

In a recent statement, Fisch said federal Conservative leader Jean Charest "personally" encouraged him to seek the nomination.

Also seeking the Tory nod is Barry Cline, a Toronto architect with a long list of community and political involvement at the provincial and federal levels.

Cline, a B'nai Brith member too, has worked on the advance teams of several provincial and federal Tory leaders.

The Progressive Conservative nomination in Thornhill will take place March 3 at Le Parc banquet hall on Highway 7.

There will also be a Thornhill riding at the provincial level, with the same boundaries as its federal counterpart. It will be carved out of York Centre, held by transport minister Al Palladini, and Markham, represented by Tory MPP David Tsubouchi.

But that won't happen until the next provincial election, when Ontario voters will elect 27 fewer MPPs, as part of Premier Mike Harris' policy of reducing the size of government. From then on, all provincial ridings will have the same names and boundaries as federal ones.

Longtime Liberal MPP Monte Kwinter told The CJN he will run in the next provincial election, but doesn't know yet in which riding.

Because of the rejigging of electoral boundaries, Kwinter's Wilson Heights riding — Ontario's most Jewish electoral district — will disappear. The new riding in which he'll run will be composed of half of Wilson Heights, nearly half of Downsview and a small part of Willowdale riding.

Teachers' union to examine Paul Fromm dismissal

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A lawyer for the Ontario Secondary Schools Teachers Federation (OSSTF) will examine the reasons given for terminating the employment of controversial teacher Paul Fromm, to determine whether the teachers organization should get involved in the case, a spokesperson for the teachers group said recently.

The lawyer will determine whether there is just cause for the notice of termination and will report his or her findings to the federation. Should the lawyer conclude there is no just cause, the OSSTF will represent Fromm at a subsequent arbitration hearing, said Jim Forster, associate general secretary for the group.

Forster said Fromm had contacted the OSSTF and requested its assistance in the wake of a termination notice he received from the Peel Board of Education. The notice of termination came after B'nai Brith Canada revealed Fromm had violated conditions of his employment when he participated in meetings of white supremacist groups.

As a member of the teachers association, Fromm is entitled to request its assistance in employment matters. Should the lawyer retained by the OSSTF find the Peel Board had just cause to end Fromm's employment, the matter will be concluded as far as the OSSTF is concerned, Forster said.

Crown says Kalejs lied as case wraps up

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After months of hearings, Crown lawyers wrapped up their case against Konrads Kalejs last week arguing the alleged Nazi war criminal is a liar whose testimony is not worthy of belief.

Kalejs repeatedly lied on the stand at his immigration hearing when he denied involvement in the Arajs Kommando, a Latvian volunteer unit that aided the Nazis in the roundup and murder of Jews, said Justice Department lawyer Donald MacIntosh. His version of events has "no air of reality" and is contradicted by numerous witnesses who served with Kalejs in the Arajs Kommado and identified him as a senior lieutenant in the unit. Furthermore, five wartime documents attest to his membership in the police unit. His allegations they are forgeries are unsupported by evidence and have "no air of reality" to them, MacIntosh told adjudicator Anthony Iozzo.

MacIntosh and co-counsel Bonnie Boucher concluded the Crown's final submissions in the marathon case against Kalejs, which began hearings last May. Government authorities are seeking to deport Kalejs, an Australian citizen, on the grounds he was involved in war crimes and because he is not a genuine visitor to Canada. He was ordered out of the United States in 1993 after a lengthy court battle there.

In testimony at his Canadian hearing, Kalejs denied he ever served in the Arajs Kommando, saying he was a student at the University of Riga and spent much of the war gathering food and working on a farm.

Kalejs, who acknowledged he served in the Latvian army before the war, admitted he served on one occasion under German SS Gen. Stahlecker in early 1942.

That testimony was contradicted by documentary and oral evidence that showed Kalejs was involved in the Arajs Kommando (AK) as a senior lieutenant virtually from its inception in the summer of 1941 and his role as commander of a guard unit at the Salaspils concentration camp. MacIntosh reviewed the evidence that was played on videotape at the immigration hearing and which was recorded by U.S. authorities for Kalejs' American hearing. Witness after witness identified Kalejs, he said.

Rolands Bahsteins said Kalejs was among the first to join the Arajs Kommando; Rudolf Soms said he heard about Kalejs' unit being involved at a battle in Saniki at which prisoners were massacred; Viktors Ennitis remembered Kalejs being present when two Jews were hung by German officers at Salaspils; and Viktors Arajs, after whom the unit is named, told a U.S. investigator that Kalejs was a company commander in February 1942 and that Kalejs accompanied Stahlecker to Russia in October 1941.

In addition, five certificates tendered to the University of Riga attest to Kalejs' membership in the Arajs Kommando, MacIntosh argued. They were tendered because under the Nazis the university was purged and only those considered reliable and who performed service for the Germans were admitted, he said.

MacIntosh pointed to two certificates that Kalejs admitted he sent to the university in 1941 — one that attested to his anti-partisan, "self-defence" activities early in the war and the second which attested to his membership in the Arajs Kommando. Kalejs' testimony that the AK certificate was false and was prepared at his behest by a friend in the unit to facilitate his university enrolment is not believable, MacIntosh said.

Kalejs told the inquiry that had he received the partisan certificate first he would not have submitted the (supposedly false) AK document. But in testimony in the United States, he said he obtained the partisan certificate first and handed it in with the AK document to increase their impact, MacIntosh pointed out.

"The real reason Kalejs handed in the Arajs certificate was that he knew the Germans and Latvian authorities would be more impressed with the fact he was serving with the AK than anything else and that this fact would give him a preference over members of self-defence groups and others getting into a university. " MacIntosh said.

MacIntosh discounted Kalejs' claim that the "damming" documents were Soviet forgeries, saying Kalejs offered no evidence to back up that assertion. Kalejs chose not to enter any forensic evidence questioning the documents' authenticity, he noted, adding that if the Soviets were attempting to frame Kalejs, they would have produced documents containing a "smoking gun."

Financing motion rejected

A move by delegate Arieh Rosenblum to have the CJC raise its own financing failed after both Ronen and Hershon said they would rather work things out with the federation.

Delegate Wayne Tanenbaum was one of the few to support the federation proposal. "They are not trying to abolish the CJC, they are trying to cut the budget," he said.

The CJC must look at a need for its own reorganization as well as examining the role of the federations, said Robbie Diamond, associate national Congress chair.

In a spirited defence of the CJC's role, Hershon declared: "There is nothing incompatible in having a strong parliamentary Congress (the CJC) and a strong federation in Canada. There is nothing wrong with the fundamental structure of the community. We should all give generously to the UJA. I hope that the federation's move to downsize is behind us."

She asked delegates to propose to their federations that the CJC budget not be cut.

A plan by the CJC to save money by opening a national advocacy office in Ottawa, perhaps with other national groups, was turned down by the federation, the minutes of the Ontario region meeting show.

CJC calls for laws to fight hate on Internet

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress is urging Metro Council to initiate a number of steps against racist groups, including advocating the use of criminal and civil law to tackle hate on the Internet.

"The Internet is not sacrosanct," states a report prepared by Congress for the Access and Equity Centre of Metro Toronto.

The report suggests Council should support use of the law against those who use computer networks to peddle hate. Council should also gather data and monitor hate groups on the Internet, establish a forum for Internet service providers to develop a code of ethics for Internet use and establish its own "Web sites" with links to other Web pages on hate groups and how to respond to them, the report suggests.

The recommendations were part of a broad spectrum of suggestions offered by Congress to address a problem that is not going away, said Bernie Farber, Congress director of community relations and editor of the report. While organized hate groups, such as the white supremacist Heritage Front, are now at a low point in their histories, they have a core of supporters and the organizations may resurface when the circumstances are right, the report states.

Civic politicians must recognize the existence of the problem and be prepared to confront manifestations of hate with strong public statements and by ostracizing hatemongers from city-owned buildings, Farber said.

They should also address the issue of computer hate, which "has to be seen as a serious criminal activity." Farber noted that police have dealt with the issue of child pornography on the Internet and "they can also deal with hate on the Net."

The report, which is divided into seven segments and includes a section written by Elizabeth Moore, a former Heritage Front spokesperson, points out that the "history of hate groups and their leaders is almost tidal — a regular ebbing and flowing of their fortunes. The movement reached strengths unheard of in the early 1990s."

While it has suffered recently following revelations it was infiltrated by a government mole, "the real danger as we head into the 21st century is that a significant number of hate group leaders have emerged who are experienced organizers and who understand the importance of 'preparing the soil' before the seeds of hate may grow," the report states.

Among the recommendations offered in the report:

- Metro Council should ask their representatives on the Metro Toronto Police Services Board "to press for the transformation of the police hate crimes unit to a dedicated full-time unit whose sole function is to investigate all hate-related crimes within Metro Toronto;"

Bernie Farber

- "Metro Council should press local school boards to offer mandatory courses on anti-racism;"
- Metro Council's Equity Centre should obtain public education tools such as CD ROMs (computer discs), videos and printed material on confronting white supremacy;
- Metro Council should refuse to give grants or business to those in the private sector who offer facilities to hate groups.

Toronto Na'amat president aims to boost group's presence

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — If Paula Schipper has her way, every woman in Toronto will have the name Na'amat on her lips.

Schipper, 45, president of the Toronto council of Na'amat Canada, says that during her term of office, which began in September, she wants everyone to know of Na'amat's work.

"Fundraising, in this day and age, is not an easy task. If everyone knows about the work we do, they are more willing to give their hard-earned money," she says.

All money raised in Canada by Na'amat goes to Israel to support the organization's projects including day-care centres, legal aid clinics, centres for the prevention of domestic violence and health care centres.

Schipper, a part-time fitness consultant, joined the organization 20 years ago when she moved here from England and says that "immediately upon joining I knew that my philosophy and the philosophy of Na'amat meshed. I am interested in anything that helps women."

A recently completed project, she says, is a women's shelter and counselling centre built in cooperation with the city of Tel Aviv. "There are a lot of domestic violence issues here and in Israel. Our money goes to Israel but our mandate is to educate women everywhere."

Paula Schipper

Program for women planned

Na'amat is currently putting together a program for women that will run at Beth Tikvah Synagogue. Topics include The Law and You, Consumer Protection, Surviving Separation and Wills, Bequests and Power of Attorney. "The more women know, the better off they are," says Schipper.

A legal aid clinic held weekly gives women a half hour of free legal advice from volunteer lawyers. As well, Na'amat has prepared a brochure alerting women as to what to do if they or anyone they know are trapped in an abusive relationship.

She concedes that women today have limited time and so it is difficult for them to volunteer. "What we're doing is trying to find larger fundraising projects so the work can be spread around.

"We are also trying to attract new members by offering them the programs that they want. It is important for us to give something to our members."

Schipper, who attends a minimum of two meetings a week, praises Na'amat for helping her hone her organizational skills and develop confidence.

Deportation proceedings begun against alleged war criminals

TORONTO — Federal authorities have launched deportation proceedings against two more Canadian residents for allegedly lying about their wartime activities in order to gain entry to Canada.

The two alleged war criminals have been given notice of the government's intention to deport them, but their names will not be released until a deadline passes for challenging the proceedings in early February.

Cases against two further suspects will be launched by the end of March.

The announcement came the same day alleged war criminal Antanas Kenstavicius died in British Columbia on the first day of his immigration hearing. The two events prompted Canadian Jewish Congress spokesperson Bernie Farber to urge government officials to begin proceedings against all war crimes suspects without delay.

"While we welcome the announcement [of two further cases], they must name the remaining suspects immediately. There is no time left. Shame on them if they don't. The only justice that's going to be left for these people is to expose them to their neighbors for who they really are and the longer the government waits, the greater is the potential for them to die peacefully in their sleep."

For years, Jewish organizations including Congress have called on the government to launch actions against alleged Nazi war criminals and two years ago, federal authorities promised to bring forward 12 cases. With the cases expected in March, all 12 will have been named, although none of the cases is close to being concluded.

Less drama, more thought

The Ontario government of Mike Harris has clearly demonstrated a propensity for the sweeping and the dramatic in its approach to legislative initiative.

During its first year of office, it tabled the infamous omnibus Bill 26, somewhat self-servingly called An Act to achieve Fiscal Savings and to promote Economic Prosperity through Public Sector Restructuring, Streamlining and Efficiency and to implement other aspects of the Government's Economic Agenda. That particular legislative initiative brought a sharp, public outcry both for its unprecedented scope and for the government's intention to essentially avoid submitting it to meaningful consultation. The bill was eventually passed, as the government's majority ensured it would, but not until some degree of public input was forced upon the government and more than 150 amendments were made to the bill.

In its second year of office, the government has again moved very dramatically, in giant legislative steps. It is rushing to dismantle seven existing municipal councils in greater Toronto in favor of one mega-council. It is reforming the residential property tax system. And it is moving quickly to "disentangle" between the provincial and the municipal levels of government, the panoply of important services currently provided to the residents of the province.

When looked at in their overwhelming reach and detail, the initiatives are far too broad and the proposed schedule of their implementation far too hasty, for the public to properly analyse and evaluate their long-term impact. From "sublime" services such as education, health, welfare and housing to the more "prosaic" ones such as transportation, sewage and libraries, every single aspect of daily life in Ontario will be effected by the proposed changes.

Are the issues not sufficiently complex to warrant less-hurried, more thoughtful consideration? It seems to us and to a great many social policy analysts, economists and commentators that they are.

Critical voices are being raised from the usual quarters of self-interest and partisan opposites. But they are also being raised by prominent members of the business constituency who question the propriety of some of the changes the government wishes to impose on Ontario society.

Last week the Speaker of the legislature, Chris Stockwell, censured the government by finding it in contempt of the legislature for its failure to respect the conventions and the norms of the legislative process as if the process were some minor administrative nuisance that it had to tolerate. The apology by Municipal Affairs Minister Al Leach, the minister responsible for the contempt, was no doubt sincere. But his apology, though welcome, missed the point. The government's penchant for rushing through complex, controversial and far-reaching proposals is unseemly.

Streamlining the government is indeed a worthy aim. But dismantling it is not. Nor is disengaging it from social welfare service areas where it ought to remain firmly and permanently active.

The government of Ontario is so driven by the ideology of efficiency and cost savings that it disdains the sina qua non of well-researched, well-reasoned, empirically-logical, sound, public policy. It is justified in adopting business principles by which to run the government. But running a government, any government, is not the same thing as running a business. Service to the people is surely a larger, more noble pursuit than service to shareholders.

Stop hate against any religion

Re: Paul Lungen's article (CJN, Jan. 16), "Anti-Semitic articles appear in Canadian Arab press."

I find the issue very disturbing. Many thanks to Sasson Mayer who made the effort to translate some of these articles and bring the matter to light.

I strongly believe in freedom of speech. Any person has the right to criticize Israel and Zionism when that person is not in agreement with their policies. However, no one should have the right to write lies against the Jews. There is no doubt that the latter is an anti-Semitic action that is outside freedom of speech and should not be tolerated. I hope that our lawmakers and politicians take note of this and take the necessary steps to stop any newspaper from spreading hate against any specific religion.

Disputes comment on Holland's record

Sheldon Kirshner quotes David Silberklang, Yad Vashem's chief historian, as saying that Holland's record is over-inflated, given the fact that 90 percent of its Jewish citizens perished during the Holocaust. (CJN, Dec. 19)

Just by using "over-inflated," does he show this inclination himself? After all, to inflate such a serious matter as deaths is criminal. To use "over-inflated" is murdering the language.

According to Solomon Grayzel, there were 150,000 Jews in Holland and 20 percent or 30,000 survived. In the Nuremberg trials it was determined that 4.5 million Jews were killed, and according to Max Dimont, seven million Christians.

I remember vividly the strike throughout the country to protest the order for the deportation of Jews. ("Nederlanders" as my father called them). But the Jewish leadership acquiesced and when the Jewish people left anyway, the strike was called off.

He is not the only one doing research.

G.M. Stehouwer
Toronto

Sheldon Kirshner replies: Whatever the reasons, Holland compiled one of the most dismal records with respect to the number of its Jewish nationals killed during the Holocaust.

Red Cross knew the truth all along

Daniel Kurtzman's revelation (JTA) in the Jan 2 edition of CJN that Red Cross documents reveal knowledge of Nazi atrocities...was indeed no news to me.

By the end of February 1945 while an inmate in Camp I Dachau-Landsberg, I was one of a group of boys and young men hand picked to fill a hastily erected model hospital. After a hectic week of preparations in which we were transformed from half-dead skeletons into almost human patients, we were visited by several representatives of the International Red Cross.

Several weeks later, after we were transferred to Camp 4 Dachau-Kaufering, every inmate of that camp received a small parcel with the Red Cross crest on it, containing one package of sugar cubes, one can of milk or cream and one pack of cigarettes.

Thunder Bay likes Toronto link

As president of Thunder Bay's Shaarey Shomayim Synagogue, I want you to know how indebted I and the members of my community are to Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, specifically Jennifer Turack (director of Community Services and Youth Activities) for putting together "synagogue link."

This project is truly a dream come true for a number of us in the community here who struggle, day in day out, to maintain some semblance of Yiddishkeit while living so very very far from the mainstream of Canadian Jewish life.

"Synagogue link" was an unqualified success, and we know that it was only the first of what will evolve into an ongoing electronic link between Toronto and Thunder Bay. Out of a synagogue membership (in gantzen) of not more than 50 souls, we had 19 turn out for the event. This translates to an equivalent Toronto Jewish per capita turnout of some 50,000 people. We really are quite pleased with our local response.

It is comforting to know that Congress' Ontario region takes responsibility for us who live in this rather remote part of the province.

Will Israel survive?

Why is it so hard to come to a peaceful solution in the Middle East? The situation can only be understood if we know Jewish history from the time of Abraham. If we do not believe what the Bible has to say concerning the Jewish people, how God led them in the past, and how He will yet lead them in the future, we will never understand what is going on in that land right now.

And not only that, if we don't watch it, we will blame Israel if the peace process fails. If there were a Palestinian state with Jerusalem as its capital, would there then be peace in the land? Who would guarantee it?

The Syrians want the Golan Heights, in exchange for another peace deal. Can the State of Israel survive when it gives up all that the others want? Well, maybe they will at least leave Israel the Western Wall, where they can go and do their weeping while the rest of the world laughs.

Perspectives

Towards a definition of Jewish education

By RABBI MARVIN B. PACHINO

The cry of alarm was sounded at the beginning of this decade, in the wake of the depressing message of the 1990 National Jewish Population Study in the United States.

While the statistics of that study may not precisely reflect the reality of the Jewish community in Canada, we heard the message. We, too, participated in conferences and discussions that addressed the future of the Jewish community. We, too, appointed commissions to investigate the phenomenon of intermarriage and the prospects for Jewish continuity. We, too, recognized our vulnerability.

Continuity became the buzzword of the '90s and somehow, hard pressed pedestrians across the continent found the dollars to fund continuity projects. They may not be huge sums, but they add up. And they are being disbursed, for the most part, for trendy, touchy-feely projects whose impact on the broad issue of Jewish continuity is questionable.

Along the way, study after study, conference after conference confirmed that the most reliable bulwark against assimilation and intermarriage is Jewish education. However, it was stressed, the efficacy of the safeguard that may be provided by Jewish education depends upon both quality and quantity.

Intensive Jewish education — namely day school education through high school — is demonstrably the most meaningful factor in the shaping of one's Jewish identity and one's Jewish commitments. It would appear, therefore, that this is where the community's focus must be directed and its resources, human and financial, channeled. Unfortunately, this is not happening to the extent that it should, but that is a subject for another discussion.

What I wish to address here is the problem of defining "Jewish education," because not all that passes today as Jewish education is cut from the same cloth. There is no standardization of curricula, and each school is a veritable school system unto itself, with a board of directors and a committee structure that are committed to preserving its institutional turf.

In itself, this is not necessarily a bad thing. However, it is confusing to the public and it makes it well nigh impossible to objectively evaluate the level of a school's success. Indeed, what might qualify as success in one school may be viewed as less than that by another.

I receive several inquiries a month from young parents who are about to enrol their first child in a day school. Since I work in the high school setting and our school absorbs the graduates of many of our local day schools, it is their assumption, nay, their hope that I will point them in the direction of the best elementary school in town.

Aside from the need for me to be politically discreet, I try to guide these confused young parents towards the articulation of their definition of a "good" Jewish education. What subject matter must be mastered in order to acquire a "good" Jewish education and for one to be considered a Jewishly educated person? What are the minimum number of weekly hours required to deliver a "good" Jewish education?

What role is there for the affective and experiential components of Jewish education, and how much weight should be given to them vis a vis the cognitive component?

Not to be overlooked is the value of mitzvah observance and the Jewish religio-moral lifestyle that parents endeavor to inculcate in their children.

By definition, education is imparting knowledge and skills through systematic instruction and training. This is certainly true of Jewish education, as well. Without core knowledge and understanding of the texts of Judaism there can be no meaningful Jewish living. But living Jewishly requires even more.

The school may step in to complement and supplement the home, but the school can never replace the home. Parents will, ultimately, discover that the best day school cannot overcome a child's cynicism toward Jewish studies and Jewish values when the home is not seen by the child as identifying with the lessons of the school's curriculum.

This is already apparent in elementary school. It is blatantly true in high school. A very great financial commitment is demanded of parents who send their children to Jewish day schools, and I neither minimize nor disparage that commitment in any way. However, where the commitment to the primacy of Jewish education and the passion of Jewish life are absent, it is extremely difficult to persuade youngsters that their Jewish education is crucial for the functioning of an intelligent, well-adjusted adult Jewish personality.

This famous photograph by Roman Vishniac captures a time when young students were comfortable with the "classical sources of Judaism and with Jewish traditions and values." [A Vanished World, Roman Vishniac, Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1983]

In addition to knowledge and skills, there is the critical issue of identifying with a value system and behavioral code that are not "in synch" with that which prevails in the general society. Judaism's code does not abide the cynicism, the obsession with pleasure, the coarseness, the vulgarity and the outright immorality that have won acceptability in today's world.

Jewish education that is true to itself must foster sensitivity to Jewish perspectives, identification with the Jewish world view and a commitment to fashioning one's life in accord with the timeless teaching of our faith. To achieve this we must go beyond texts.

More than 40 years ago, Abraham Joshua Heschel stated it this way: "What we need more than anything else is not textbooks but textpeople. It is the personality of the teacher which is the text that the pupils read...The modern teacher...is the intermediary between the past and the present...Yet he is also the creator of the future of our people."

In other words, unless the teacher, in his or her lifestyle and personality, is the embodiment of the texts he or she is teaching, students will not develop the conviction from which is born the passion for Jewish living. Consequently, in defining Jewish education, the teacher plays a more important role than does curriculum.

In this connection, what is often missed is the fact that the best Jewish education neither begins nor ends in the school. Its beginning is in the home, where parents are the textpeople, where the Jewish book is read, the Jewish song is sung, the Jewish ideal is articulated, Jewish practice is natural and the framework for Jewish living is put into place. Here, the role of parent as teacher is of unparalleled significance.

In the same essay from which I quoted above, Heschel insisted that the significance of Judaism does not lie in its being an instrument for Jewish survival or a tool for Jewish continuity. Its significance lies, rather, in its being a fount of spiritual wealth, a source of deeper meaning in confronting life's struggles, and the matrix of those guiding principles which must inform the conduct of a Jew in his or her most mundane activities.

This is what Jewish education must be about. Jewish identity and Jewish continuity are meaningless except in this context. The attempts to extract and focus upon the universal aspects of Judaism to the exclusion of the parochial and particularistic will, in the end, fail to bear fruit.

One manifestation of such attempts is the development of social action and community service programs in many Jewish schools, ours included. To give it a Jewish twist, they have been labelled chesed programs or have been cloaked in that overworked and terribly misunderstood term, tikkun olam. Students are urged, in some cases required, to become involved in volunteer work for communal organizations and agencies, to visit the sick, assist the elderly, and generally extend themselves in behalf of others.

No one can say that this is anything but good. In fact, there are specific mitzvot involved and being performed. Nonetheless, I continue to harbor certain gnawing misgivings with regard to the way we have imposed these social service requirements upon students. My misgivings here are not dissimilar to those I have with regard to the prebar/bat mitzvah requirement of youngsters to attend Shabbat services over a specified period of time.

Unless synagogue attendance and chesed activities are an integral element in the parental life pattern, how long before the children realize that these are nothing more than burdens placed upon them because they are not big enough, independent enough, to fight back? When will they realize that these activities bear little, if any, relevance to the real world of adults? At which point will they rebel?

As well, the term tikkun olam as a Jewish value is specious when it is used to express only a piece of the concept that frames the Jewish imperative. The operative aspect of the concept is generally not noted by those for whom tikkun olam has become the essence of their Judaism. Either they never knew or they have forgotten that the Jewish notion is of tikkun olam b'malchut Shaddai, the perfection — repair, if any will — of the world under the Kingdom of the Almighty.

God's idea of a perfected world and His expectations for human behavior in that world define for Jews what tikkun olam truly is. Remove God and His commandments from the picture and you are left with secular altruism.

One does not have to be Jewish to be committed to the cliche of tikkun olam. A number of public and private schools have, in fact, incorporated social action into their programs.

Uninspired by Jewish spiritual values, uprooted from the soil of Jewish principles which transform a "good deed" into a mitzvah, these activities, however desirable they may be, will probably have no import for Jewish identity and continuity.

In a recent essay, Dr. Michael Rosenak, professor of Jewish Education at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, took note of the fact that "attempts to educate Jews without bringing them into contact with the sources that are the cultural trademark of Jewishness have not met with much success." Rosenak further asserts, "We cannot afford to make do without the wisdom of our tradition and [without] the attempts of Jews to live by it in our times."

I often have the feeling that we are too self-conscious about being who we are supposed to be; so we work very hard at blurring the lines that characterize our distinctiveness. We are uncomfortable with the classical sources of Judaism and we are ill at ease when it comes to linking ourselves and our life style with Jewish traditions and values.

What, then, is the "cultural trademark of Jewishness" if not a firsthand knowledge of our own sources and a commitment to a pattern of behavior that is inspired by those sources? What sort of Jewish identity can it be that does not draw its defining characteristics from the principles and values that constitute the Jewish heritage?

When all is said and done, these are the fundamentals that are essential to a definition of Jewish education, and these are the measures of its effectiveness.

An egalitarian Shabbat in Jerusalem

ISRAEL DIARY IV

No one can escape the Shabbat aura in Jerusalem, even if it is punctuated by flying stones and cries of "Shabbos." Most of the city welcomes the day of rest in some way, from those who cease all activity at the sound of the siren marking the beginning of Shabbat, to those who spend Friday night with friends and family, and Saturday morning head for the beach.

By Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

A dilemma: Where do we find the egalitarian, traditional atmosphere of our own synagogue? We try Kol Nishama where, as we enter, over 200 people of all ages and stages have begun a familiar Lecha Dodi. We are tapped on the shoulder — Vancouverites! One, a rabbinical student at Hebrew Union College (HUC), invites us to the school and on Monday we arrive at 8:00 a.m. for the minyan.

Both men and women participate wearing tallit and t'fillin. Following a d'var Torah, the group breaks up and we are led on a tour by rabbinical student Tali. Students have just finished the ulpan and are preparing for the beginning of fall classes. At present there are more women than men among the more than 80 training to become rabbis, cantors, and Jewish education directors for the Reform movement.

Of the two main buildings to the campus located next door to the King David Hotel, the first was built before 1967, when this area stood on the edge of no man's land, facing the tantalizingly inaccessible Old City. The view is breathtaking. The second building was designed by Moshe Safti and is a charming combination of Middle Eastern arcades and gardens, surrounding a more practical area of classrooms and library. There is a gan (kindergarten for children) and a small archaeological museum named after the pioneer archeologist Nelson Glueck.

Classes last from 8 a.m. to 4 p.m., with the additional requirement of participation in social action projects. Those without the fluency in Hebrew Tali enjoys must catch up. In addition, she tells us as we sit down in the rather spartan student lounge, they have to face the bewilderment that Israelis have as to exactly what Reform Judaism is. Not overt hostility, she hastens to add (although that hostility exists), but ignorance of alternatives to the Orthodoxy most familiar to secular Israelis.

Part of the answer to this ignorance may be the new president of HUC, Rabbi Sheldon Zimmerman. He is the first non-classical "Reformer" to head the institution and his Orthodox background and strong Zionism make him "a great role model" for the class he will ordain. The students are enthusiastic about him and about the program initiatives underway. The first year for rabbinical students will emphasize the study of Hebrew text, with students able to give a daf shiur, an exposition of the text they study.

Rabbi Zimmerman is making progressive Judaism visible in Israel. A member of the only inter-denominational rabbinical association in the county, Rabbis for Human Rights, he has been quoted extensively in the media. Along with other non-Orthodox rabbis, he was featured in a recent Jerusalem Report on non-Orthodox Judaism in Israel.

Some in the rabbinical establishment, and of course, the Haredim, consider North American Conservative and Reform Judaism as "non-Jewish" sects bearing no relationship to true Judaism. Conservative and Reform congregations in Israel no longer receive government support, unlike recognized Orthodox rabbis and congregations, schools, and yeshivot.

In addition to regular classes and volunteer work, students enjoy such special events as a colloquium week planned for the fall, where they will hear Alice Shalvi, an Orthodox scholar and outspoken advocate of women's rights, and Avraham Infeld, head of Melitz, an institute dedicated to Jewish education in the Diaspora.

In fact, these students are already preparing for their eventual careers in congregations. Tali spoke of the challenges the pulpit offers. Like rabbis of every denomination, they are already conscious of the gap between clergy and congregation in praxis and knowledge. It is their goal to enable their congregations to realize their greatest individual and communal potential for tikkun olam, repair of the world. And what does Tali want to achieve as a rabbi?

"My first interest was to contribute my strengths" (and, with a laugh) "my weaknesses to the community. In the past year, I realized the huge need in North America for meaning in family life and spirituality. Judaism has all those ingredients and I would love to give back to the Jewish community in North America what Judaism gives to me — enjoyment in life, a sense of where we come from and obligation to a sense of justice."

Sounds to me like a mission any rabbi, regardless of denomination, shares.

Helping the less fortunate

This column is a follow-up on last week's where I reported on the Out of the Cold program: religious institutions sheltering and feeding the poor on their premises.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

A lot of people become uncomfortable when they hear that their synagogue (or church or mosque) is undertaking a form of social activism that may be termed "political." Religion and politics, they say, don't mix, and rabbis like other spiritual leaders should stay out of the fray and stick to their business. But just precisely what is their "business?"

I should say quickly that this kind of statement is heard more often in Christian than in Jewish circles. For Christianity is primarily directed at individual salvation, toward having the right kind of faith and doing the right thing, like loving your neighbor.

Judaism begins with community

Judaism, on the other hand, does not begin with the individual, it begins with the community. While everyone remains an individual and is subject to mitzvot, it is our membership in the Jewish community that forms the necessary framework of Jewish life. Look at the prayer book, which invariably speaks in the plural. We invoke the Divine Presence, and on the High Holy Days we, as a people, confess our sins, even though not everyone in the congregation has committed the particular averah that is being recited. Therefore, when some people are poor, everyone of us is affected. It is very much Judaism's concern.

The prophets frequently operated in the political realm. Moses, when he confronted Pharaoh, was asking the Egyptian ruler to make a vast socio-political change in his country and liberate thousands of slaves. When hundreds of years later (in 589 BCE) the Babylonians were threatening to take Jerusalem, slave-owners let their serfs go free as the Torah commanded. The owners hoped that God might be assuaged and miraculously the Babylonians did cease their siege. But as soon as they left, the slave-owners re-indentured their serfs, with the result that the prophet Jeremiah chastised community and king for going back on their ethical duties. He prophesied that the Babylonians would return and that the city would be destroyed — which in fact it was soon thereafter. In the same vein did the rabbis of later centuries always consider social issues to be the province of religious demand. Our synagogues are not operating in the abstract; unless they are rooted firmly in the social needs of their time they do not fulfil their religious task.

In the Diaspora, we have on occasion tended to feel that "they" — i.e. non-Jews — should look after these matters. It was the wrong conclusion then and it remains wrong today. Feeding the poor, objecting to socially disruptive polices of governments and advocating the establishment of a society free of discrimination — all these are religious tasks and hence they challenge us as Jews as much as anyone.

The Kirshner File

German Jews' emotional bonds proved tragic

When Adolf Hitler assumed power 64 years ago this week, Germany was home to approximately 525,000 Jews. Within a few years, the community was devastated.

Roughly one-third emigrated before Kristallnacht in 1938. Another one-third left in the following 10 months, leaving 164,000 Jews in the Third Reich. Of these, 123,000 eventually perished in the Holocaust.

These figures beg a question: Why, in the face of such a virulent strain of state anti-Semitism, did so many Jews obstinately remain in Germany?

This conundrum is posed by John Dippel in a superb new book, Bound Upon a Wheel of Fire (HarperCollins, $38.75), which turns on the divergent lives of six German Jews who epitomized the cultural, patriotic and economic ties that kept such people from fleeing.

Dippel's subjects, who serve as representative samples of German Jewry, are: Leo Baeck, the chief rabbi of Berlin; Robert Weltsch, a Zionist luminary; Hans-Joachim Schoeps, a German nationalist youth leader; Bella Fromm, a newspaper columnist; Max Warburg, a banker; and Richard Willstatter, a Nobel Prize-winning chemist.

Dippel — who likens their emotional bond to Germany to an abusive marriage — explains that rootedness, complacency, incredulity, smugness, naivete, wishful thinking and opportunism (some Jewish businessmen temporarily fared well in a resurgent Germany) accounted for their reluctance to pack their bags.

Ultimately, all six did emigrate, but only under the greatest of duress. Their attachment to Germany was dictated by an abiding belief that they were true Germans. Having matured in an emancipatory era when they were no longer automatically treated as pariahs, they felt comfortable and at ease in Germany.

Granted, they realized that anti-Semitism was deeply embedded in their homeland on the grassroots level and that anti-Jewish political parties sought to roll back the gains they had achieved since the 1870s. And yet they also knew that, relatively speaking, they were a blessed generation. But with the rise of Nazism, their genteel bourgeois existence was yanked from under their feet.

Rabbi Baeck called for calm and reason, and though his illusions were finally shattered in the wake of Kristallnacht, he stayed behind. "I will go when I am the last Jew alive in Germany," he said. Deported to Theresienstadt in January 1943, he survived his ordeal. He immigrated to the United States in 1948, became the president of the World Union for Progressive Jewry and returned to Germany to lecture on several occasions. He died in London in 1956.

Weltsch, editor of the Jewish Observer, claimed that the "abnormalities" in Germany would disappear if Jews affirmed their Jewish identity. Jews could then find a niche within the new order. In 1938, however, he settled in Palestine. And after covering the Nuremberg war crimes trials, he moved to Britain. He spent the final three years of his life in Jerusalem.

Schoeps, desperately believing that an accommodation with the Nazis was possible, thought that a form of second-class citizenship for Jews would mollify Hitler. But he, too, was finally disabused of his notions. Sent packing to Sweden, he moved back to Germany in 1946, dying in 1980.

Fromm, who was romantically involved with a high government official, left Germany in the late 1930s on the advice of powerful non-Jewish friends who had protected her until then. She settled in New York City, wrote for American publications and died in 1972.

Warburg, like Fromm, was thoroughly assimilated, and was convinced that Nazism would not last. But after his bank was "Aryanized," he immigrated to the United States, where he died in 1946.

Willstatter believed that he could somehow disassociate himself from reality by burrowing into his research. But in 1939, he gave up. With the help of a German diplomat, he slipped into Switzerland. Three years later, he succumbed to a heart attack.

In hindsight, these German Jews were tragically naive. But would you, dear reader, have behaved differently?

Racist state

Hitler's Third Reich has the dubious distinction of being the first — and so far only — state whose official dogma was unmitigated racism.

Racial theories were not exclusive to Germany, but they enjoyed the widest currency there.

The reasons are explored by historians Michael Burleigh and Wolfgang Wippermann in The Racial State: Germany 1933-1945 (Cambridge University Press), a lucid, thoroughly-researched volume which plumbs the origins and practices of Nazism.

The thrust is on the persecution of the Jews of Germany, but the book also deals with the fate of the gypsies, the mentally disabled, so-called social deviants and homosexuals.

Race theories in what is now Germany have their antecedents in the 18th century. But it was left to an Englishman and Germanophile, Houston Stewart Chamberlain (1855-1927), to postulate the theory that the Germans were the most superior people on earth, and that the Jews represented a demonic threat to the chosen German race.

Blended with traditional, theological anti-Semitism, and the growing accusation that Jews were responsible for the negative fallout of rapid industrialization and modernism, Chamberlain's concepts were seized upon by a failed painter and former corporal in the German army named Adolf Hitler.

Considering Jews the embodiment of evil, Hitler made no distinction between German and foreign, rich and poor, religious and non-religious, or baptized and unbaptized Jews. Hitler succeeded in combining and radicalizing "all previous strains" of anti-Semitism into a potent force.

The first anti-Jewish laws, enacted in April 1933, sanctioned the dismissal of non-Aryans from the civil service. The next wave of anti-Semitic legislation, in 1935, disenfranchised Jews, forbade intermarriage and banned Jewish doctors, professors, teachers and notaries from state service.

The tempo of anti-Jewish actions slowed in 1936 and 1937, but picked up with a vengeance in 1938, the year of Kristallnacht. Many of the laws were designed to exclude Jews from the economy and render them destitute. On the eve of World War II, nearly one-fifth of the Jewish population was dependent on charities.

In July 1941, Hermann Goring entrusted Reinhard Heydrich with the task of "making all necessary preparations" for bringing about "a complete solution of the Jewish question." The sober bureaucratic language disguised the Nazis' real intent — the systematic extermination of European Jewry.

The infamous Wannsee Conference in a Berlin suburb in January 1942 sanctioned the Final Solution throughout Europe. To the tinkling of cognac snifters, the Holocaust was officially launched, with all its attendant consequences.

Food bank's presence grows

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Loren Freid

TORONTO — In the 11 years he's run the North York Harvest Food Bank, you'd think Loren Freid had seen everything.

But developments in recent years have surprised even him. In fact, he considers them "really scary."

"People you wouldn't think of come to food banks." They're university-educated victims of corporate downsizing, members of [formerly] two income families now on social assistance and people fearful of losing their jobs, he said.

Add these new users to the people who've been struggling to make ends meet for years and who face a 22 percent cutback in provincial welfare allocations, and you see a lot of hunger in the community, Freid said.

The government cutbacks have forced some to make awful decisions — "decide if you'll pay the rent or feed your kids. That's a horrible position to be in," he said.

In an interview in his spartan office in the food bank's 9,000-square-foot location on Chesswood Avenue, Freid looked back at the organization as it marked its 11th birthday. Back then, fresh from university with a liberal arts degree and after a visit to Winnipeg, Freid was impressed with the work being done by the city's Harvest Food Bank. With no immediate plans for the future, Freid decided that North York needed something similar. Toronto at that time was coming out of a recession and while the economy was good, people were struggling to get back on their feet in the aftermath of the slowdown.

When he approached merchants, many didn't believe that North York had a problem with hunger, he recalled. But thanks to the support of Adi Kolber and Bernie Pont and their B'nai Brith chapter, Freid was able to get the food bank off the ground.

The first location was a cramped 3,000-square-foot facility at Finch and Weston where food was warehoused prior to delivery. In that first year, the food bank distributed 100,000 pounds of food while holding promotions to increase its profile in the community.

At the time, "I had no thought I'd be around 11 years later. I thought I'd get it off the ground and a professional would take over."

The food bank struck a nerve in the community and became a success. Distribution grew from 100,000 to 300,000 and then to 700,000 lbs. in just a few years. In its fourth or fifth year, it hit the one million pound mark, where it has languished for some time. Freid speculates that despite Torontonians' traditional generosity, donor fatigue has set in. For the past six years, contributions to the food bank have plateaued and there doesn't appear to be any indication that will change any time soon. In addition, people who have given to the food bank in the past are now coming there for help, he said.

Facing that bleak reality, Freid has grafted another mission onto the food bank's traditional role of amassing provisions — "telling people why others don't have enough food."

He's started an information campaign, talking to Members of Parliament and to provincial legislators. "We give them this information. They shouldn't be creating policy in a vacuum," he said.

Freid maintains that this approach predated the Ontario Tories' policy of cutbacks to welfare, but said that recently "we're more vociferous telling the people the situation is worse. Because we're a food bank, we're right in there and we get a certain perspective that other organizations don't get."

As North York has grown, it has acquired the problems of other big cities, including hunger and poverty. More and more people are seeking assistance all along Yonge Street, from York Mills to Finch, he said.

To supply the sites that provide food, like the Lansing United Church or the Jane/Finch Community Ministry, the food bank has a staff of three full-time employees, two part-time workers and more than 100 volunteers. About 10,000 hours of volunteer time are amassed each year. The food bank operates on an annual budget of $250,000 and distributes about $2 million worth of food each year to more than 35 non-profit feeding programs, making it one of Canada's largest food banks, he said.

Freid takes a salary out of that yearly budget, but when he started the food bank, he didn't pay himself during its first six months of operations. Afterwards he took home the grand sum of between $200 and $300 a week.

The food bank has been rewarding to him in other ways. He met his wife, Lisa, through the food bank when she volunteered there. And he took pride in seeing the enterprise grow to become important in the community.

"When you're the founder of something, you get a certain satisfaction out of its success," he said.

After 11 years with the food bank, Freid has a simple message for the people of North York. While they've made a tremendous impact in fighting hunger, they should continue to be "understanding of people who come to food banks. They come due to need and we ask them to get involved, do more, and ask questions of their elected officials about what they're doing about the hunger problem in Metro Toronto."

Community Matters

Goldstein salutes UJA Federation

David Goldstein stepped down last week as UJA Federation's Campaign '97 chairman, after leading a $35.5 million fundraising drive. He'll be co-chairing the Top Gifts Division for Campaign '98. In this interview with Community Matters Goldstein discussed the high points of his 14 months at the helm.

David Goldstein

Q What were the major highlights of the 1997 campaign?

A The Prime Minister's Mission that Bonnie and I led last May to Moscow and St. Petersburg was definitely one of them. In particular, I will never forget the time we spent in a bomb shelter in Kiryat Shmona while katyusha rockets were coming down around us. I really felt our presence made a difference to the people we were with.

The Campaign Launch in August and then Super Sunday in September really set the tone for the campaign. I remember feeling like we could do anything.

Q What accomplishments in this campaign are you most proud of?

A Obviously it was very important to us this year to campaign for new gifts. Even though there are many people out there we still have to reach, we've made some real progress and campaigners are working hard to keep up the momentum.

Q How does working with UJA Federation compare with other volunteer work you've done?

A I think the time frames at UJA are unique. Things happen much quicker and there's often a sense of urgency driving things ahead. But even though many of the programs are put together quickly, you would never know from the outcome.

The quality of the volunteers and staff is really what makes it all happen. They make me look good.

Q Were you surprised by anything you experienced as Campaign chairman?

A Wherever I travelled I was overwhelmed by the respect people have for Toronto's UJA Federation and the campaign. Many people told me how much they admired our programs and the techniques we use. It made me very proud.

Q Will you miss anything in particular?

A I'm a people person and through UJA Federation, I've been given the opportunity to meet so many different people. I'll miss the constant interaction.

Q How did your experience affect you personally?

A I feel very lucky to have been given the opportunity to represent such a well respected organization. The whole experience of working with such dedicated volunteers and staff was very rewarding. I also made some very good friends.

Q What advice do you have for your successor Leo Goldhar?

A I told Leo that time flies by quickly so make the most of it.

Vicki Campbell

Campbell counts on new volunteers

Vicki Campbell believes she raised more than money this year as UJA Federation Women's Campaign Chair. She helped to raise a new generation of leaders.

The Women's Campaign performed superbly in both areas. It accounted for $4 million plus toward the overall total and the newly launched mentoring program, which teamed up more experienced volunteers with novices, "did a lot to make first-time campaigners feel more at home while making calls," according to Campbell.

Other achievements cited by Campbell include attracting new contributors and the ongoing progress of sharpening awareness about UJA Federation.

Campbell considers the International Lion of Judah Conference in Jerusalem, which she attended, one of the year's highlights. There she listened to Jewish women recounting how their lives were saved by the UJA Federation-funded Jewish Agency.

"I not only felt privileged to meet these women, " explains Campbell, "but also to share their stories with others."

Daren feels inspired

Michael Daren

An 89 year old gentleman named Jack, just Jack, was the one person Michael Daren will remember most when he looks back on his term as Vice Chair of the UJA Federation 1997 Campaign.

Jack lives alone in a one bedroom apartment near Bathurst St. and Lawrence Avenue. His wife died more than 10 years ago and his children, who live out of town, hardly ever see him. If it weren't for weekly visits from Senior Care, a UJA Federation beneficiary agency, and daily excursions to the Bernard Betel Centre, Jack, like many other elderly in his situation, would live a bleak existence.

Daren learned of Jack's story because his wife Carolyn is the Senior Care volunteer who makes Jack's world a brighter place.

"Jack calls me each week to tell me that my wife is an angel," explains Daren. "Volunteer visits and other services UJA Federation provides for seniors throughout the community are important because they send people like Jack the signal that they haven't been forgotten."

Daren says that knowing how much of a difference UJA Federation can make in the lives of so many inspires him. "Aside from family, this has been the most satisfying part of my life." In the upcoming campaign, Daren will chair King David's Circle.

Engel eager to move ahead

For veteran volunteer David Engel, the only thing more exciting than being Vice Chair of UJA Federation's 1997 campaign is looking forward to an even more successful Campaign '98. Engel will be joined by Glennie Lindenberg as next year's Vice Chairs.

"We've accomplished so much in one year," says Engel, "so I just want to keep plowing ahead and keep the momentum going."

Engel says he's most proud of strides made in raising UJA Federation's profile in the community.

"Thanks to all the outreach we've done more people are recognizing the centrality of UJA Federation and that translates into more contributors."

And more outreach is exactly what Engel wants to see in the 1998 campaign. "The challenge will be to communicate our message to segments of the community we haven't yet reached."

David Engel

What will Engel remember most about the 1997 Campaign? "So many of the people I worked with have become friends," he explains. "The dedication of the volunteers and staff is really something like to be around."

WHAT A CAMPAIGN!

UJA Federation's Campaign '97 is one of the most successful in years, with the final campaign total expected to touch down at $35.5 million or more.

It was a campaign packed with historic events and unprecedented challenges as governments dramatically reduced funding for many services.

These are some highlights of a campaign that reached beyond the top.

UJA FEDERATION

EMERGENCY RESPONSE

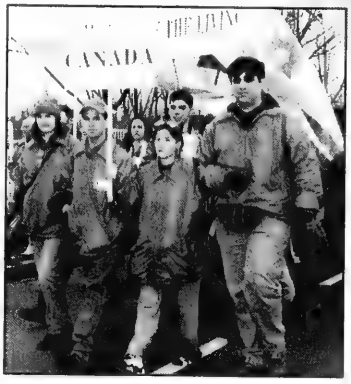
In January, 1996, UJA Federation raised $400,000 in just two days for immediate assistance to the Jewish poor.

FUNDS FOR THE FUTURE

$100,000 in UJA Federation continuity grants were awarded in February to 15 outreach projects designed to strengthen Jewish identity. An additional $170,000 was disbursed in October.

MEGA MISSION

Mission 3000, February 19-28, the largest mission to Israel in Canadian history, sponsored by United Israel Appeal and UJA Federation, took over 1,000 participants from Metulla to Eilat. There were 400 mission members from Toronto.



MARCH OF THE LIVING

In April, more than 100 high school students from the Greater Toronto Area received a sobering education in Jewish history on the UJA Federation/UIA March of the Living. The Canadians joined 5,000 other young Jews on the emotional journey from Auschwitz to Birkenau before visiting Israel.

BURG AND BARAK

UJA Federation brought Avrum Burg, Chairman of the Jewish Agency and Ehud Barak, front runner for Israel's Labor party leadership to Toronto in October.

JOURNEY TO JERUSALEM

UJA Federation's Community March For Israel, May 26, drew an extra large crowd of 7,000, celebrating Jerusalem's 3000th birthday. This year's Walk - Steppin' Out For Israel - is on Sunday, May 25.

LOVE UR ROOTS

That was the theme of UJA Federation's Community Campaign Launch in August, featuring Al Waxman and Israeli recording artists Shorashim. The Launch at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts captured the hearts of over 1,000 participants.

SUPER SUNDAY

It started at 9 a.m. on September 8, ending 12 hours and $2 million later. A record number of volunteers, including more than 250 representing 28 businesses, organizations and schools, collected pledges from 6,000 community supporters.

Debbi Stern and dad, Don Rafelman, co-chaired Super Sunday.

NEW GIFTS TAKE OFF

October's New Gifts launch signalled the start of the most concentrated effort to reach first time contributors ever undertaken by UJA Federation. A series of new gifts telethons, including the first ever in York Region, raised over $800,000 from more than 2,500 donors.

PARTNERSHIP MISSION

UJA Federation leaders on the Prime Minister's Mission experienced a Hizbulla bombing raid inside a Kiryat Shmona shelter.

WONDERFUN

IT'S OVER

The campaign officially closed last week, but calls and visits will continue to those who have yet to be reached.

Community Matters, a supplement of the Canadian Jewish News, is sponsored and produced by UJA Federation. Website: www.feduja.org*

WHAT A CLOSING!

The official closing of UJA Federation's 1997 campaign was celebrated in typical UJA Federation fashion - a little reminiscing, a little fressing, some laughs and a lot of thank you's. More than 250 community volunteers joined UJA Federation leaders and staff at Beth Tzedec Synagogue to celebrate the past year's success and to toast one of the best UJA Federation campaigns ever.

דיוויד-Shine

תנועה אותנטית ואמת צרופה :

Prague-born singer realizes dream in Canada

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Singer Lenka Lichtenberg came to Canada because she spoke English with an accent.

"I was studying music in Denmark. They told me I would never make it there because I spoke Danish with an accent; so I decided to head for Canada where I knew half the people have an accent," she says.

But further adventures awaited the Prague-born entertainer when she settled in Vancouver in 1982. She began to tire of her work as a piano player and singer in Vancouver bars and in lounges aboard Princess cruise ships plying the Caribbean. And then a visit to Israel in 1987 changed the course of her life irrevocably.

She decided she had strayed too far from her Jewish roots: "When I was growing up in Prague, we weren't allowed to say we were Jewish out in the open. You can imagine how this affected my mother who spent nearly three years in the Terezin camp, and only survived because as a girl of 13 she worked out in the fields and could get enough to eat."

After her Israel experience, however, Lichtenberg decided to switch to songs of the Jewish people in Yiddish, Hebrew and English. She hopes to record her own song Child of Survivors on an album in the spring.

She has already appeared at several concerts in Toronto, but took a break to attend a three-year course at York University leading to a degree in ethnomusicology. Lichtenberg was a familiar sight on the York campus, where she took her first daughter Hannah, then 3 years old, to class with her. Now she and her husband, Rubin Cohen, an Israeli-born chartered accountant, have two other children as well, Rachel, 4, and Benjamin, 2.

A mezzo-soprano, Lichtenberg speaks four languages, Czech, English, French and Danish, and understands a little Yiddish and Italian.

"My very next project is to learn Yiddish well enough to speak it," she says.

Her parents still live in Prague, where her mother, Jana Renee Friesova, directs a Jewish studies program at Charles University.

"The young Jewish people in Prague look upon her almost as a Messiah, she is bringing so much news about Jews to them," Lichtenberg says.

"BY GEORGE, I THINK SHE'S GOT IT"

JEWISH NATIONAL FUND OF TORONTO
TU B'SHVAT TELEBLITZ
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1997

This year's celebration of Tu B'Shvat (The New Year of Trees) is very special as we celebrate the Centennial of the Zionist Movement — founded in Basle, Switzerland in 1897 by Theodor Herzl, thus initiating the move to Jewish Statehood and the role of the JNF in helping to build a strong, secure, beautiful and peaceful Israel.

Many volunteers, including the members of various Youth Movements in Toronto, will gather to conduct the telephone Teleblitz in a major effort to have as many trees as possible planted in Israel on this very special occasion. When you receive your telephone call, please be generous. Thank you in advance. If time does not permit and our volunteers do not call you this Sunday, or if you won't be home, please call us at the JNF office (416) 638-7200 to make your donation and to arrange for us to plant your trees in Israel.

Seniors programs flourish in downtown Toronto

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Seniors living in the downtown core can take advantage of a host of programs at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) says the centre's seniors co-ordinator.

Judy Weinryb, who has developed programs for seniors at the BJCC says, "In today's ever changing multi-cultural society, there still exists a core of elderly Jews — some are isolated, frail men and women —who need social connections as well as services. The frail and healthier older adults are looking for stimulation and the chance to keep growing intellectually and culturally."

Weinryb said that Toronto Board of Education programs are offered, including exercise, bridge, knitting, pottery and current events.

"We invite members of the community to our weekly BJCC Seniors Club to enjoy many exciting programs. We celebrate holidays together and we address issues of concern and interest to seniors in general — lectures, musical programs films, parties and trips.

"The BJCC would like to draw the socially isolated seniors to our programs and we have made outreach one of our goals," says Weinryb. The building has a ramp, is wheel chair accessible and there is an elevator.

She notes that in recent years, political and economic changes have had a tremendous impact on services for seniors.

"Part of our mandate as a senior's program is to provide the opportunity for our members to connect, not just on a social plane but to help them become knowledgeable and advocate for themselves and one another."

She adds that the social programs are important, particularly in stressful and confusing times. The program creates opportunities to build a sense of community among its members.

"And how nice it is to be there for the individual who would just like to talk, share a story or a special memory."

To get on the free mailing list, call Weinryb on Tuesdays or Thursdays at 416-924-6211.

Forum for boomers

TORONTO — Today's baby boomers are becoming the primary caregivers for different generations of relatives: children, grandchildren, parents and sometimes even grandparents.

Canadian Friends of Bikur Cholim is holding a forum on what has come to be known as the sandwich generation. The event, called The Sandwich Generation: How Do you Slice It? will be held March 26 at 8 p.m. at the George Weston Recital Hall of the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts in North York.

Some of the topics to be covered will be balancing the dual roles of child care and elder care, the financial and emotional burdens.

The Creative Approach to Bridal Registry

These days, most engaged couples register for gifts. It's a direct way to communicate your preferences. You may not have thought of this, however you can also register for original works of art!

A Show of Hands is a contemporary craft gallery offering truly exceptional one of a kind pieces from hand blown glass, to ceramics, magnificent Judaica to jewellery. They specialize in alternative registries and corporate gifts. What is an alternative registry? Gallery director Sara Levine-Petroff explains, "It's a wish list. It either augments a conventional registry, or is chosen in lieu of it. People register for many different reasons; engagements, housewarmings, birthdays, anniversaries, or bar and bat mitzvahs. Today, many couples are getting married after establishing their careers. They may already have the household basics such as cookware and dishes, and are looking for special pieces to accent their homes. Original, signed works that reflect their lifestyle."

When asked about the trend of today's choices in craft works, Sara notes, "It's a marriage between form and function. People are looking for functional craft pieces that can be used when entertaining. Many of the contemporary Judaic artworks such as menorahs and sedar plates are left on display all year round in our clients homes."

A Show of Hands has a truly inspired range of attendants' gifts, and can accommodate personalized commissioned works. Information on the artist is included with every signed piece. When registering, you are extended a 10% discount on all attendants' gifts.

After 13 years, A Show of Hands Contemporary Craft Gallery has become known as the choice destination for unique, inspirational gifts. If you have never been to the gallery, be sure to stop in before you consider registering anywhere.

Location: 1947 Avenue Road, at Felbrigg, 5 blocks south of Wilson. Gallery hours are 10:00 a.m.—6:00 p.m. Monday—Saturday.

"Boutique Hotel" offers many wedding benefits

Making sure that a wedding goes well involves hundreds of details. Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto will take care of them all under one roof, meaning less stress on the wedding party, and more enjoyment for everyone — bride, groom, family and friends.

Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto hosts wedding parties of 40 to 180 people, starting at $80.00 per guest, plus gratuity and taxes.

When you book your function at this marvelously mid-sized downtown hotel, which offers self parking after 6 p.m. for all guests of the bridal party, you'll find something special in store for both bride and groom.

The festivities begin at 6 p.m. with a one-hour cocktail reception featuring complimentary piano player, open bar and hot and cold hors d'oeuvres. This is followed by an elegant four-course dinner with imported wine, and sparkling wine afterwards for toasts. There is a four-hour host bar after dinner, and coffee and tea service at midnight.

Also, the bride and groom receive one free room on the wedding night for every $1,000 spent, to a maximum of five nights. For example, if there are 70 guests at $80 each, totalling $5,600, there would be five complimentary rooms for the bride and groom to offer family and friends. (These figures do not include taxes and gratuity.)

Rates start at $179 for a single or double room, with special rates during the slow season. When they arrive on their wedding night, the bride and groom receive a complimentary suite and chilled champagne. Before setting out next morning on their honeymoon, they are served a continental breakfast (sliced fruit, Danish pastry, croissants and coffee).

If you wish, Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto will be pleased to organize every aspect of your wedding within the domain of the hotel, from flowers to entertainment. The catering manager will attend to every detail to ensure all goes smoothly. This level of service is in keeping with Hotel Inter-Continental's profile: it's a "boutique hotel" for individual business travellers, families, intimates and small groups (and possibly a celebrity or two in search of privacy and quiet).

Expert kosher affairs at the Sheraton Centre

For over 10 years, the Sheraton Centre Toronto Hotel has been the location of choice for hundreds of happy couples who want a luxurious alternative to a synagogue wedding.

"Many brides and grooms decide they want a traditional kosher wedding, but in a location other than a synagogue," says Carin Robertson, Director of Catering Sales for the Sheraton Centre Hotel. "The Sheraton Centre is an elegant, unique choice."

"Combine our dedicated kosher kitchen with our award-winning level of personal service, add your choice of recently-renovated function rooms and top off with our ideal location in the heart of downtown Toronto, and you've got a recipe for success. We've been hosting kosher events ... from weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs, cocktail parties, through to conventions, and gala evenings,... since 1985, every day of the week" (excluding the Sabbath).

The Sheraton Centre Toronto has a completely separate kosher kitchen, complete with its own china and flatware, strictly supervised by the Kashruth Council of Ontario. "The Kashruth Council's Mashgiach has the keys to our kosher kitchen, and is present during all preparations and for each and every affair," says Robertson. "So, it's not necessary to make the regular kitchen kosher each time."

The experienced and talented chefs offer creative and flexible menus to suit any taste. Both the kitchen and the serving staffs are accustomed to dealing with kosher affairs, and can easily and professionally handle any concern their clients may have.

Executive Chef Heinz Wagner has been with the hotel since the inception of the kosher cooking services. A past president of the Escoffier Club, an association of Toronto executive chefs, Wagner has been instrumental in creating exciting kosher cuisine in the city.

It should not be thought that the Sheraton is only for a grand wedding. Facilities and services are available to serve affairs of 200 people, to those of 2,000 people.

"We have facilities," comments Carin Robertson, "to fully service a kosher wedding, including being able to offer separate rooms for the signing of the contract, the ceremony, and the reception."

Indeed, and for those couples who request an outdoor Chupah, the Sheraton Centre Hotel has the perfect place: 2.5 acres of outdoor gardens, complete with waterfalls, right in the midst of the hotel. It is also a spectacular setting for portraits and family photographs!

"No matter whether your plans call for something extremely formal, or more relaxed, our team of Catering experts will ensure your wedding day is picture-perfect," states Robertson.

Out-of-town guests will enjoy the Sheraton Centre's convenient location, connected to City Hall parking, steps from exciting shopping, theatre and sightseeing. Kosher meals are also available through room service.

Personalized service, talented, experienced staff, your choice of facilities. An award-winning hotel with a dedicated kosher kitchen, located in the heart of downtown. No wonder the Sheraton Centre Toronto Hotel has been the alternative of choice to synagogue weddings for over 10 years.

For more information, contact Carin Robertson directly at (416) 947-4896.

Clients rave about Stuart Moscoe Photography

"Professional, organized, calm, sensitive, kind. These are the qualities we wanted in a photographer for our daughter's wedding. In selecting Stuart Moscoe, all the qualities we had hoped for materialized into relaxed photo sessions and a huge choice of proofs of the posed and candid shots, resulting in an outstanding album."

— Stan & Sue Freedman

"As a wedding co-ordinator who has worked with Stuart on numerous occasions, I highly recommend his services. He is professional, efficient and most important, he is fun to work with. That is why I chose him as my photographer when I got married."

— Nina Linder & Douglas Hoffer

"A photographer can make or break your wedding day. Stuart made ours. Capturing the sheer joy we all felt, on film forever. The problem we encountered was actually deciding which of the photographs we liked the best. Every shot was a winner."

— Sara Levine Petroff & Steven Petroff

"We have used Stuart Moscoe on many occasions for weddings and family portraits. He was always easy to deal with, and the quality of his work is excellent. We would not hesitate to recommend him when quality work is required."

— Elaine & Jerry Cooper

"Stuart Moscoe was easy to work with and very comforting on our hectic wedding day. The work he produced was highly creative, and the quality was excellent. We were thrilled, and we have referred him to many of our friends."

— Jason & Stacey Cloth

"We get raves for the pictures Stuart did for our son's wedding. Everybody loves them, and they ask who the photographer is."

— Jerry & Karen Papernick

Stuart Moscoe Photography offers complete photographic service, including colour and black & white photography, sepia-toning and hand-colouring of black & white photographs, custom retouching, print finishing and framing, and a full range of albums. Stavros cuts from royal cloth

You see it first not in the clothing, but in the cloth. Once inside the door of Stavros Theodoropoulos' shop, bolts of fine English and Italian fabric beckon from rosewood shelves that shimmer with a muted gloss. "This," you decide, "is a special place. If they care how uncut fabric looks, they must care even more about the finished suit."

STAVROS
MASTER TAILOR & SHIRTMAKER

Upstairs, you find Stavros himself. Here are his office and fitting room — and the workroom where several employees, silent but for the click of needle on thimble, sit absorbed in their work. "Each tailor has a specialty, like pockets or lapels," Stavros explains; "but each can make a whole suit too. The hardest jobs, though, like basting an armhole, I do myself."

Nothing leaves the shop without passing Stavros' personal inspection

Stavros started apprenticing in his native Greece at age 14, and was making suits by 21. He moved to Canada in 1959 and started a partnership; but in 1966, homesick, he returned to Athens and opened a shop. He did well, becoming tailor to the Greek Royal Family, until the 1967 coup; and in 1969 he returned to Toronto, to make or break it.

Twenty-seven years later, with a distinguished clientele from across the globe, it's fair to say he has "made it." Each year, he still receives a card from King Constantine. Celebrities such as Red Buttons, Mr. T, Jerry Lewis and Crocodile Dundee wear his suits; his regular customers include the Bay Street crowd, and men and women who fly in from San Francisco and numerous other American cities for his exquisitely tailored garments.

"After 20 years," Stavros asserts confidently, "the suit I make you will look as good as the day you first wear it. And if something wrecks it — say, a bad cleaning job — I can restore it to look like new."

Stavros' shop makes 600 suits a year; each takes four fittings and 32 hours. Except for a few ancient sewing machines, everything is done by hand; and nothing leaves the shop without passing his personal inspection.

The only thing that saddens Stavros, as he looks back, is the thought of having no successor. The old-fashioned master tailor is a dying breed; his own tailors are ageing; and there is little interest in the apprentice programs that would keep the craft alive. This man, who has elevated fine tailoring to an art form, brings new meaning to the phrase "it's lonely at the top."

Even with quality material and design, mass production can merely mimic, but not duplicate, the work of an artist. You were not made by computers; how can a computer make a suit that matches your uniqueness?

Those who treasure their individuality and feel their best in garments made expressly for them will find Stavros Master Tailor an oasis of comfort in today's mass-merchandised world.

The dying art of master tailoring flourishes in Stavros' shop

-The Park Plaza Hotel — Elegant Ambience for your Wedding

Elegantly nestled in midtown, a stone's throw from Queen's Park and adjacent to fashionable Bloor St. and Yorkville shopping, the Park Plaza Hotel boasts a 60-year tradition of successful functions. Engagement and rehearsal parties, weddings, anniversaries, bar or bat mitzvahs and a myriad of other social occasions have been enjoyed within its hallowed halls. A visit gives considerable insight into how the tradition grew.

Permanent Kosher kitchen

Sumptuous but low-key, its rich but subtle colors highlighted by gleaming brass fittings, the Park Plaza's European-style ambience suggests a blend of joy and decorum that one would associate with a wedding. The service, attentive yet unobtrusive, manifests a corresponding adherence to high standards and attention to detail. This year, to bring this living tradition into the next century, the Hotel is enjoying an extensive facelift.

In 1987, the Park Plaza opened its permanent Kosher kitchen. Since then, the Hotel has made a specialty of fine Kosher cuisine and catering, for events ranging in size from an intimate 30 to a gala 300.

Catering manager Don MacDiarmid, Catering Sales Manager Carole Dekoker, and Executive Chef Joan Monfaredi are a hands-on team who take direct responsibility for every facet of every Kosher event, from reserving the ballroom to adding the final touch to a special entrée. At the Park Plaza, you are in the capable, careful hands of experts who consult you at every stage, while relieving you of much of the pressure so that you can enjoy your special occasion.

The Park Plaza Hotel will host your wedding ceremony, as well as reception, dinner and dance. For an event with 30 to 60 guests, Mr. MacDiarmid especially recommends the spacious yet intimate Roof Salon, one of Toronto's most romantic downtown settings with a sweeping panoramic view of the city.

The Park Plaza Hotel offers you inclusive wedding packages covering everything from flowers to chuppah to dinner. Also, there are special room rates for your out-of-town guests.

The Park Plaza Hotel is located at the northwest corner of Bloor and Avenue Road, close to parking and the subway. For further information, call Don MacDiarmid at (416) 924-5471, extension 1572. The manifold benefits of a Park Plaza function are yours to enjoy.

They are well known for creating quality foods with special attention given to detail and presentation, along with a dedication to providing the superior service required to make your wedding impressive, memorable, and hassle-free.

The facilities at Beth Emeth lend themselves to a ceremony, cocktail hour, and dinner or luncheon reception, that flow naturally as your special day progresses. Beth Emeth Synagogue is completely accessible from the oversized Wilmington St. parking lot, or Elder St. entrance, into the chandeliered beautiful foyer where your guests are met with complimentary coat checking, linen dressed table with seating cards, and a warm and comfortable sanctuary or chapel setting in which to share your very special wedding ceremony.

The elegant Fischtein Hall, located on the main level, just behind the sanctuary, can accommodate wedding parties of 150 to 450 people, including a large dance floor and raised stage for musicians. Upstairs (accessible by elevator or grand stairway) is a very pretty room, the Arback Hall, accommodating up to 150 people with full kitchen facilities.

Goodman's Bridal Registry: A Family Affair

Gisella Goodman founded Goodman's China in 1969; and their family business has been thriving ever since. Any day of the week Gisella, Sam or their daughters Susan and Rosemary are in the store, happily serving their customers.

Goodman's staff are knowledgeable, long-term employees who enjoy working with people. Their pleasure in offering personal service has brought customers back for generations; the children of former brides and grooms are now coming in to register.

Staff will set a table to show your selection to your guests; they will help in everything from buying within budget to choosing bonbonieres. Storage, gift wrapping, exchanges and 5-day-a-week delivery are free.

To register, no appointment is necessary. However, Goodman's suggests you do so before sending any invitations, so you and your guests can use the registry to its best advantage.

Currently, Goodman's is computerizing its registry. This will make it easier to keep you posted on promotions, new or discontinued patterns, and what quantity is in stock at any time.

To start your hope chest, you may register before you have plans to marry. After marrying, you may continue the registry for anniversaries, in Goodman's special long-term file.

Every quality trademark is on Goodman's shelves such as Royal Doulton, Wedgwood, Waterford, Royal Crown Derby and Mikasa. There are over 800 dinnerware and over 300 flatware patterns, both informal and formal, plus a full range of stemware, giftware and housewares.

This wide selection is all on one floor, so you can easily see and compare. Our everyday low prices and our extra special sales speak for themselves.

Goodman's China is located at 221 Wilmington Ave., minutes from Hwy. #401. Hours are Monday, Tuesday, Friday & Saturday 9:30 a.m. to 6:00 p.m., Wednesday & Thursday 9:30 a.m. to 8:00 p.m., and Sunday 12:00 noon to 5:00 p.m.

Mr. Disc Jockey for total entertainment

When the day for your wedding comes, you want to be relaxed enough to enjoy time with your guests; but in order to relax, you have to be sure all the details of the entertainment are taken care of. That's why you should talk to Ed McMurtry at Mr. Disc Jockey.

A pioneer in total-entertainment packages, with 17 years experience, McMurtry has made Mr. Disc Jockey into the elite of his profession, for those who want the best. "I welcome clients with high expectations," he says confidently.

At weddings, McMurtry observes, the bride and groom rely on the maitre d' and event co-ordinator to run things smoothly — or, if there is no event co-ordinator, the disc jockey. Music pervades a wedding: ambient sound for the reception, relaxing dinner-and-conversation background, and of course dance music; and a good disc jockey integrates what he plays with what's going on at the time.

Mr. Disc Jockey is built on planning and team spirit. In regular workshops, McMurtry and his team carefully rehearse everything from the wording of an introduction to how to operate new equipment. They back each other up, and work well with live singers, musicians and other professionals, so that elements as diverse as decor and music will harmonize.

Mr. Disc Jockey pays close attention to your wishes, relieving you of the pressure to look after every detail. McMurtry and his team see to everything from lighting to logistics — whether it's signalling you that it's time to go in to dinner, or helping a guest find misplaced car keys.

McMurtry, who has worked at many weddings and bar mitzvahs, has noticed how the words we use mirror the differences between them. A wedding is always called a wedding, emphasizing the ceremony. A bar mitzvah, however, is often called a simcha: special, uniquely Jewish, but with the emphasis on celebration.

At a bar mitzvah, rambunctiousness and special effects are appropriate. After all, the "star", the bar mitzvah boy, is 13 years old; and the DJ is often his "co-star", aiding and abetting him, making sure the entertainment matches the age of the chief participant, and at the same time keeping the high jinks within limits.

Joyous as a wedding is, it has a solemnity in keeping with a lifetime commitment made by two adults. Elegance and etiquette matter more, much as they do at a gala theatrical event; decor and decorum go hand in hand. McMurtry and his team wear tuxedos, not sequined vests; and his performance as a disc jockey is dignified and low-key.

McMurtry knows how to create ambient sound which has volume without loudness; you can feel the music on the dance floor, and converse at your table. Mr. Disc Jockey has a repertoire of thousands of selections, to meet every possible request from old standards to the latest club tunes.

Mr. Disc Jockey is also adept at making the smooth segue from live performers to CD's and back; in answering requests, for example, the disc jockey might play CD's with the latest hits, while the band plays the standards. Music also calls on McMurtry's talents as a diplomat, when someone requests a song the bride or groom has designated a no-no. "Usually," says McMurtry, "the hosts are accommodating: they want their guests to have a good time."

Of course, this is the ultimate test of any celebration, and of Mr. Disc Jockey. "At a wedding," says McMurtry, "the measure of success is simple: do your guests stay as late as they can, till 1 a.m. or later?" Satisfied clients will tell you that Mr. Disc Jockey lives up to this standard; but don't take anyone's word for it. Find out for yourself: call Ed McMurtry at Mr. Disc Jockey: (905) 737-8670.

BECAUSE THE SUCCESS OF YOUR SIMCHA DEPENDS ON THE QUALITY OF YOUR ENTERTAINMENT . . .

Amandalina's exquisite bridal brochure vividly illustrates the quality of their gowns as well as their ethos

Your first impression on entering Amandalina's magnificent bridal salon is twofold: spaciousness and color. The showroom is wide, the ceiling high; on the main level, soft overhead lighting shows to full advantage the warm reds, blues and greens of women's cocktail dresses and suits.

A curved staircase rises to the mezzanine, where a wide array of bridal gowns unfolds before your eyes, in every style from austere to opulent. This welcoming space is white with touches of cream; the lamps are bright but gentle; and deep skylights let in diffuse light from above. There are leather sofas and lounge chairs to relax on; the dressing rooms are comfortably large.

Amandalina's is about love. In a world where many people think it's chic to be cynical, partners Sam Pollari and his wife Rachelle are romantics, and proud of it. Each page of their bridal brochure features a romantic gown, accompanied by an aphorism in praise of some aspect of true love.

Sam and Rachelle offer quality bridal gowns at moderate prices, as well as evening gowns and women's apparel for special occasions. They carry a wide selection for the mother of the bride, and count many mother-and-daughter duos among their customers.

Bridal gowns range from $600 to $6,000; a wedding gown for a moderate budget, says Sam, runs about $1,500. Amandalina's carries many popular North American designer lines, and serves both the professional woman and the traditional homemaker.

Since opening in 1995, Amandalina's blend of romanticism and a good sense of customer taste has proven to be a winning formula. (It helps, of course, that Sam has 16 years' business experience, and that Rachelle is an experienced designer.)

In this era of rapid change, there are still some trends you can trust. Bridal fashions, for bridesmaids' wear as well as bridal gowns, tend to stay in vogue for a year or longer.

The "greening" of special occasion wear

This year, says Sam, one popular color for special-occasion wear has been greenwood, a shade with the lustre of Kelly green and the depth of the color of fresh pine needles. He also sees a long-term trend in favor of black evening wear. While colors aren't "out", they're not as much "in" as they were, either.

"Black has longevity," he explains, "you can wear it anywhere." Even to a wedding? Yes; if this is the colour that brings out the best in a woman — and she knows it — there should be absolutely no impediment to her wearing it.

Also, Sam observes, brides are becoming more sophisticated and demanding. We are all more visually sophisticated than ten or even five years ago, and less ruled by convention.

Another factor which influences demand is that brides are more mature. Many women today spend several years in a career before they marry; and in these years, they learn independence of mind, certainty about what they want, and greater sophistication.

Amandalina's staff are not merely salespeople, but bridal consultants. Joyful as it is, a wedding is also a time of stress; and the staff see it as their responsibility to relieve that stress for you. From your first visit until the day you take your gown home, Amandalina's offers you not just the gown as product, but the service that goes along with it.

Amandalina's gives you the personal attention that goes with shopping by appointment, but without the pressure; when coming on an evening or Saturday, appointments are recommended. Feel free to touch the fabrics, too: "part of feeling comfortable with fine silks and satins," says Sam, "is to run them through your fingers; and you shouldn't need to wait until your wedding day to do it."

Alterations are done on the premises. You should order three to eight months in advance, depending on the gown's origin; a European design, for example, will take longer to order in.

Once your gown has arrived, there are two fittings, the pinning and the final fitting; so allow four to six weeks for alterations, depending on the season. The bride, says Sam, usually wants to take the gown home one to two weeks before the wedding.

Amandalina's is at 4040 Steeles Ave. West, just west of Weston Road, in the "Bridal Plaza". Look for the "4040" sign on the north side. Feel free to drop in, or make an appointment, whichever you prefer. Sam suggests, however, that if you're coming on an evening or Saturday, you call first: 905-856-8680.

The latest styles, wonderful service, a relaxed environment, and sharp prices: at Amandalina's it's entirely practical to be incurably romantic.

Love does not consist in gazing at each other, but in looking outward in the same direction.

Is The X-Files' David Duchovny Jewish?

The truth is out there...

By DAVID J. LITVAK
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — I kept hearing rumors that David Duchovny (alias Fox Mulder), the leading actor on the hit television series The X-Files, was Jewish. Were these rumors fabricated to confuse the public or were they true? I wasn't quite sure, so I made up my mind to investigate.

Guest Voices

I decided to infiltrate the set of The X-Files as an "X-tra." I had the perfect cover. I had heard from reliable sources that The X-Files was shooting an episode in a Vancouver park where the extras had to don chassidic garb. What could be easier than playing that kind of part? After all, I am a Jew.

On the way to the shoot, I met a production assistant who informed me that David was half Jewish. But I wasn't sure which half. Well, at least it was a start.

I was transformed into a chassidic Jew, with payot, a long black coat and a bushy black beard which in all honesty made me look more like a Hutterite than a chassidic Jew. Oh well, I hoped, maybe no one would notice. I would have to make the best of it.

I made my way back to the holding tent where all my fellow extras were assembled. With dozens of us cloaked in traditional chassidic dress, the tent was beginning to resemble a yeshivah in a shtetl. It felt like we should have been discussing Talmud instead of talking about mundane secular matters like when lunch was going to be served.

I spoke with some of my fellow "Chassidim" before we went out to the set and asked them a lot of questions about the previous week's shooting, which I had not been a part of. Some of the scenes were set in a makeshift synagogue and apparently, Duchovny and Gillian Anderson, his co-star (Special Agent Dana Scully on the program), were both there.

"Did you get a good glimpse of Duchovny?" I asked hopefully.

When they replied in the affirmative, I followed up with, "So, nu, did he look Jewish?" Unfortunately, I couldn't get a definitive answer.

At least I didn't have to investigate whether Anderson was Jewish. With a name like that, the chances were pretty slim. But then again, I was recently informed by a reliable source (a rabbi, no less) that pop singer Olivia Newton John is Jewish. But the odds were a lot better that Duchovny was Jewish. And so my investigation continued.

We were called out to the set and Duchovny was nowhere to be found. Instead, David Groh, an actor who performed with Valerie Harper on the '70s hit television series Rhoda, was there. "Is he Jewish?" I wondered. But I let the thought pass. I had bigger fish to fry.

The shooting for the scene was about to begin. Queen Elizabeth Park in Vancouver was transformed into a Jewish cemetery for the day. It was quite a sight to see: dozens of makeshift Chassidim huddled around a makeshift grave in a makeshift Jewish cemetery in the middle of a Vancouver park. There were fake tombstones bearing unlikely names like David Smith and Lily Tippet. The only thing real in the entire park were the birds and the trees (at least I think they were real).

So, all of us fake Chassidim gathered around the grave of a fake corpse (at least I hope it was a fake corpse) ready to say the mourner's Kaddish with a rabbi (who was not a fake).

I took my place at the graveside and had a pretty good spot to monitor the proceedings, until the director decided to replace me with another extra. Do you think he suspected something? I wonder if he knew anything about my investigation. Who could have tipped him off? I was beginning to feel paranoid. How appropriate!

Dating Winona Ryder

As the day wore on, I continually heard rumors that Duchovny was Jewish. A woman who had acted as a religious and cultural advisor on the set (she was a teacher at a local synagogue) had a good close-up look at Duchovny at an earlier shooting, and got the impression after speaking to him that he was Jewish. And one of the hairdressers on the set (who also happened to be Jewish) claimed that not only was Duchovny Jewish, but that he was dating Winona Ryder, a nice Jewish girl and a very talented actress.

Since Duchovny was not going to make an appearance on the set, I was going to have to let it go at that. If a hairdresser claims Duchovny is Jewish, why should I doubt it? I mean, since taxi and limo drivers know more about the inner workings of government than anyone else, why shouldn't a hairdresser on the set of The X-Files know all the comings and going on the show? It seemed quite logical to me. So, I decided to take his word for it.

Anyway, my beard was beginning to itch. It's not easy being a chassidic Jew, even for a day. I had my payot and beard removed and resumed my life as an ordinary, non-chassidic Jew. And I brought my investigation to a close with a firm suspicion that Duchovny is Jewish, but with no conclusive evidence (like bar mitzvah pictures for example or witnesses from his brit) to confirm my suspicion.

It's almost like believing that extraterrestrials exist but not having any firm evidence. Well, not quite. Anyway, I'll just have to do some more investigating. But I'm sure that if I keep looking, I'll find that the "truth is out there."

Jewish student leaders meet in Waterloo

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

WATERLOO, Ont. — About 45 Jewish student leaders from 10 Ontario university campuses convened here over a recent weekend to address common issues and renew their enthusiasm at the annual Council of University Presidents (CUP) conference coordinated by Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region.

Shabbat was spent at Kitchener's Beth Jacob Congregation and Sunday at Wilfrid Laurier University. In addition to Laurier, participating campuses were McMaster University, Queen's University, Ryerson Polytechnic University, Trent University, University of Guelph, University of Toronto, University of Waterloo, University of Western Ontario and University of Windsor.

Guest speakers included Eli Rubinstein of United Israel Appeal as well as shlichim Yehuda Marle of Hashomer Hatzair and Shula Ofir of Habonim Dror.

Fourth-year student Heath Applebaum, president and founder three years ago of the Jewish Students Association at Laurier, co-ran a session about Jewish religious pluralism on campus.

"Pluralism is a big issue," said Applebaum. "You have a varied student population." Finding programs that suit both observant and non-observant students is a challenge, he added.

"The important things that came out of the conference were effective programming on campus and how it's important to bring in kids from all [Jewish] denominations," said Jennifer Turack, conference coordinator and director of community services and youth activities at CJC, Ontario region.

"How to recruit more students, get them more involved and get them to take leadership roles is a problem for smaller campuses. I definitely got a sense that they'd be taking things back, and they know they can turn to each other for different ideas."

A number of inter-campus events were discussed and participants extended invitations to other campuses for upcoming events such as a Shabbaton in Guelph and a semi-formal in Hamilton.

To facilitate further interaction, a province-wide test-run Internet meeting was scheduled for Jan. 27. The hook-up is part of a recent Council of Jewish Federations initiative known as the RISE program. The acronym stands for regional interstudent engagement and is also expected to establish program banks for the use of campus leadership.

"I thought the conference was a great opportunity to be with other student leaders," said Jocelyn Heisel, president of the small but active Hillel at Queen's. "It's always sort of empowering to be with other students who have similar interests and are striving toward the same things."

Carly Steinman, president of the Jewish Students Association at McMaster, returned from the conference with "a more heightened awareness of the kind of leader I am, what I do well and what I should watch out for."

Participants compared notes on programming at their respective campuses, said Heisel. Particularly useful were analyses of programs that worked on one campus but not on another, she noted.

"We all came back energized. This week I've been spending more time on JSU than on my homework," said Elana Lavine, vice-president of Western's Jewish Students' Union. Lavine was one of four representatives of the London, Ont. campus.

"We need conferences like this to motivate us, to learn from each other's mistakes and to learn there are other people like us out there. I think most of us have a real passionate feel for Judaism. [We] have to inject that kind of passion into others to make sure they continue this effort," said Applebaum.

Alleged war criminal dies

ABy MAURICE LUCOW
Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Just a few hours after a federal immigration adjudicator opened an inquiry into the proposed deportation of alleged Nazi war criminal Antanas Kenstavicius on Jan. 22, Kenstavicius died of cancer.

Justice Department officials here who were to prosecute the case had been advised earlier that Kenstavicius did not have long to live, and defence lawyers had asked for deferral of the case.

The adjudicator noted that a medical report had shown some time ago that the accused had only a few weeks, but said that as long as Kenstavicius was still alive, the inquiry would proceed and he adjourned it until mid-February to gain time to study documents submitted by government lawyers.

Morris Soronow, counsel at the hearing for Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, told The CJN that Kenstavicius' death "proves how little time we have left to deal with the several other Nazi suspects who live in Canada."

According to Justice Department lawyers, Kenstavicius was a deputy police chief and then police chief of the Svencionys and Trakai districts of Lithuania from 1941 to 1944.

In September 1941, he supervised the roundup, transportation, confinement and execution of 7,000 to 8,000 Jews, acting on orders from the Germans.

Kenstavicius fled Lithuania for Germany in 1944. In order to immigrate to Canada, Justice department lawyers said, the accused used an "improperly obtained visa…He fraudulently obtained International Refugee Organization status as a displaced person and refugee."

When interviewed by a Canadian immigration team, he lied about his age and his past, they said, "which foreclosed further inquiries by Canadian authorities into his true activities during World War II, particularly his employment history and activities as a Nazi collaborator and member of the German army."

JNF to honor NCJW members

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Manitoba and Saskatchewan region of the Jewish National Fund (JNF) will honor two prominent members of the National Council of Jewish Women (NCJW) at its 1997 Negev Dinner on June 17.

Both Marsha Cowan and Sharon Wolchock say they are overwhelmed by the unexpected honor.

Wolchock is national president of the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada and has been involved with the NCJW for over 30 years. She has also chaired the Women's Division of the Combined Jewish Appeal and has served as an executive member of JNF, among other community positions.

Cowan has held a number of leadership positions in the local NCJW, including chairing the campaign for and serving as president of the NCJW-inspired Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre for Jewish seniors.

She has also devoted her time to Jewish Child and Family Service, the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council and the Combined Jewish Appeal, where she is currently incoming vice-chair of the Women's Division.

Kamloops area launches group to fight racism

By MAURICE LUCOW
Western Correspondent

KAMLOOPS, B.C. — Assisted by a $13,000 grant from the provincial government, a group has been set up here to combat racism in the Kamloops area.

Public education in the homes and the community will be key tools in the fight, it was decided by a steering committee that will organize an umbrella organization taking in other groups which are fighting racism.

Kamloops Immigrant Services executive director Trudy Dirk told Canadian Jewish Congress that she is "delighted with the response from the public and I'm pleased there are so many people interested in sharing our vision of wanting to do something."

She said the difference between the new group and the city's race relations committee is that the latter deals only with city-related institutions.

At the meeting was MP Nelson Riis, who said he's recently noticed an escalation in racist remarks made to him in every day conversations. "One of the most uncomfortable phrases coming at me lately," he said, is " 'I'm not a racist but...' and after the but, come the racist comments," He blamed tough economic times for the increase in racism and said that is when people start looking for a scapegoat.

Riis said the activities of the neo-Nazis "encouraged me to get in touch with Trudy and say we've got to do something," adding there are several groups in the city that try to deal with racism in some way but they aren't related. "We need an umbrella that will bring these groups together."

Arthur Manuel, a leader of the Shuswap National Tribal Council said racism isn't directed only against immigrants or newcomers to Canada. "It's a very complicated problem that's rooted in Canada's origins," he said.

Some of the measures to be taken to combat racism include: creating institutional change in large Canadian businesses which do not represent the community makeup in their staff; liasing with all governments, using March 21, the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination as a kickoff event and reaching outside the city boundaries to smaller communities where racism appears.

McGill, University of Jordan launch joint project

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Over the past 16 months, McGill University social work professor Jim Torczyner made 11 trips to Jordan in his quest to somehow make the peace treaty between that country and Israel pay tangible dividends to ordinary citizens.

He found a sympathetic ear in Mohammad Maqusi, then academic vice-president of the University of Jordan (U of J), who like himself believes there can be no lasting peace if the most disadvantaged do not see it as improving their lot.

The result was the recent signing of a declaration of cooperation between McGill and the U of J to establish the first school of social work in Jordan, with the financial help of the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) and the expertise of the Montreal Consortium for Human Rights Advocacy Training (MCHRAT), which Torczyner directs.

Since 1992, MCHRAT has helped open three university-affiliated social welfare advocacy "storefront" offices in Israel, modelled on Montreal's Project Genesis, which Torczyner initiated 20 years ago.

Torczyner describes the U of J project as "paralleling" those in Israel in that their ultimate aim is promoting social justice which Torczyner —and Maqusi —feel goes hand-in-hand with peace. Poverty breeds extremism in their view.

Originally, Torczyner had envisioned opening a Project Genesis in Amman, but it was decided to first have a professional social work program in place that could develop an approach to rights advocacy in keeping with Jordan's cultural values.

Jordan is undergoing social change and gradual democratization, and that is bringing with it challenges that the West has experienced, Maqusi said. These include unemployment and women seeking to move out of traditional roles. At present, 53 percent of university students are women and they are pursuing careers.

Currently, any social work in Jordan is carried out by mainly female volunteers and to a certain extent by the Ministry of Social Development. (King Hussein's sister, Princess Basma, whom Torczyner met, and Queen Noor have endorsed this cooperative project.)

In time, Jordanian and Israeli academics may find a way to work together on solving the region's social problems, both think.

"It will take time...We don't want to begin anything that will end in failure, because it is difficult to start all over," Maqusi said.

"After 50 years of war, trust has to be built," added Torczyner, "and that takes place among individuals, like ourselves." He will sit on the U of J's social work program committee.

CIDA's $121,000 grant will enable two Jordanian academics to study at McGill next fall. Torczyner hopes he can raise enough funds to also sponsor two Israeli students. Under the MCHRAT umbrella, the four may continue to dialogue.

"Social development and peacebuilding must go hand in hand because one cannot be achieved without the other...," Torczyner said at the signing.

Among those attending were Mount Royal MP Sheila Finestone, who expressed Canada's support for the project, and representatives of the governments of Israel, Egypt and Bahrain.

Jews' exodus from Egypt shocked the world

By RABBI RONALD WEISS

What does one do when confronted by what appears to be a miracle? How ought one to respond?

At the beginning of this week's parshah, we hear of one man's reaction to the Divine intervention that enabled the Jewish people to go forth from Egypt. According to our tradition, this was not news that occurred in a vacuum. Our sages indicate that the entire world was aware of G-d's involvement on behalf of Israel. This was the first and only time in the history of the world that a nation of slaves was removed from the midst of another nation — against the will of their "masters."

The sages teach us that this news literally shook the world because nations were stunned to see G-d's hand actively interceding on behalf of a subservient people. Yet, despite being truly awed at the exodus of the Jews, none of the peoples of the world reacted meaningfully to this unprecedented event. Only from Yitro was there a spiritual and physical response. Why?

Rashi, the foremost commentary on the Torah, offers a most unusual explanation for why Yitro came out into the desert to meet the newly liberated nation. He singles out the two miracles of keriat Yam Suf (the splitting of the sea) and milchemet Amalek (the defeat of Amalek in battle) as the reason Yitro came out to join the camp of Israel. However, the Torah itself testifies that Yitro was induced to come because of all of the great news he had heard: "All that G-d had done for Moshe and for Yisrael, His people, that the L-rd had brought forth Yisrael from Egypt" (Exodus 18:1). Thus, why did Rashi emphasize keriat Yam Suf and milchemet Amalek?

Clearly, Rashi felt that these miracles were unique and, therefore, had a powerful impact upon the mind and heart of Yitro, which compelled him to join the nation in the desert. However, perhaps we can suggest another perspective from which to understand Rashi's explanation.

The two miracles of keriat Yam Suf and milchemet Amalek have a common theme. Both of these experiences evoked a strong feeling of achdut Yisrael (unity in Israel). Among the miracles that occurred at keriat Yam Suf we are told that the sea split into 12 parts to enable each tribe to go his own way. Rav Ovadiah Bertenura, in his commentary to Pirkei Avot (5:4), states that the walls that separated the tribes were transparent like glass, so that each tribe could see what was happening to the others. The Jews were committed to seeing each other through the dangers they faced at the sea.

Slepak family's struggle for freedom

The Gates of November: Chronicles of the Slepak Family* by Chaim Potok (Random House of Canada).

In June 1978, Vladimir (Volodya) and Masha Slepak painted these words on a large sheet, "Let us go to our son in Israel," and displayed it defiantly from the balcony of their Moscow apartment. It was a warm, sunny day. "The streets were crowded with Muscovites on their way to work. It did not take long for a large crowd to gather. KGB agents in the neighboring apartment tried to tear down the banner with a long pole, but Volodya seized the pole and broke it. The crowd began to number in the thousands, and traffic came to a halt."

Before long, however, KGB agents smashed the apartment door to pieces, tore away the banner and took the courageous pair into custody. Voldoya was sentenced to five years of exile in Siberia.

The Slepaks were among the most famous of the "Refuseniks," Jewish activists who were denied exit visas to emigrate to Israel. Ingeniously, unremittingly, the Refuseniks struggled against a vicious system of oppression in which Jews as Jews were afforded few rights. It took Volodya and Masha 17 years, a span of time filled with privation, bureaucratic harassment, shattered hope and much heartbreak before they were finally granted visas to Israel in 1987.

The Soviet Union is now but rubble in history's trash heap and the Slepak family in Israel and the United States can live in freedom — as can other Jews who left the tyranny of a moribund regime.

But the foregoing is only part of Chaim Potok's story. The remainder concerns Volodya's father, Solomon Slepak, one of the fervent Bolsheviks who built the Soviet Union. He left early 20th-century America and made his way to the Soviet Union, where he became a high-ranking functionary who somehow weathered the purges and bloodshed of the Stalin era. A military figure, he commanded 10,000 soldiers against the Cossack bands who opposed the creation of the Soviet Union. Until his death, he continued to defend and uphold the Communist party, disdained the political activities of his son and strenuously opposed him in every way possible.

The author, who has successfully depicted the rift between father and son in such novels as The Chosen and My Name is Asher Lev, now does the same in this story of bitter generational conflict and the ideological issues that separated a passionate son from his bewildered father.

Ironically, Solomon at his son's birth had named him after Lenin. Volodya went along with his father's views until 1952, when Jewish doctors were arrested on trumped-up charges of attempting to poison Stalin and other high officials. This alleged plot that would have led inevitably to widespread anti-Semitism and Jewish suffering was prevented only by Stalin's death.

Potok has skilfully dramatized this tragic and fascinating story. Along the way, he introduces much information about Russia and Jews before and during the Soviet era that is always interesting, if not always pertinent. He makes good use of taped reminiscences of Volodya and Masha; regrettably, the material about Solomon's life is more sketchy (the KGB refused to release his files) and most of it comes from secondary sources.

In an epilogue to the book, Potok — in a pessimistic vein — wonders about the future of freedom in the United States. "Are we approaching the finale now to the bright possibilities once inherent in this land? Is that old America forever gone? Were we seduced as schoolchildren into a vision of a land green and golden from sea to shining sea, a land as illusory for many Americans as the Motherland of Solomon Slepack was for Volodya and Masha?...Things are happening to us today that we don't seem able to explain. Can we enter the uncertain future without the corrosive cynicism, the clutching greed, the divisive self-interests — the beasts that destroyed the world of Solomon Slepak and rendered it uninhabitable to his family?"

One hopes that the successful and inspiring struggle of the Slepaks for freedom provide an affirmative answer to the author's troubling questions.

Unprovoked attack by Amalek

The unprovoked attack by Amalek in the desert elicited the same response of achdut Yisrael by the Jewish people. We are told "Remember what Amalek did to you on the way out of Egypt. When they met you on the way and you were tired and exhausted, they cut off those lagging behind and they did not fear G-d." (Deut. 25:17-18). Rashi comments on these words that Amalek waged war against those Jews who were weak spiritually due to the sins they had committed and against those who had been expelled from the clouds of G-d's glory which afforded Divine protection.

Why did Moshe order Joshua "Choose for us men and go out and fight with Amalek" (Exodus 17:9), which Rashi understands as making war against him? One can imagine that there were people in the desert who said "Let them get what they deserve. After all, if they had not sinned, they would not have put themselves outside of the clouds of Divine protection."

Nevertheless, Moshe and Joshua felt differently and the Almighty agreed with them, as we read: "I [the L-rd] will totally eliminate all remembrance of Amalek from under heaven" (Exodus 17:14). G-d approved of the devotion of these two great leaders who were willing to share the fate of those, who because of weakness, found themselves outside the camp of the faithful, in the hope of bringing them back within the fold.

All Jews are precious to us, even those whose spiritual connection is weak. This, I believe, is what drew Yitro out to the desert and what we need just as much today — achdut Yisrael.

Rabbi Weiss is the director of Chaplaincy Services at Jewish Family and Child Service in Toronto.

The answer is blowing on the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

This past Shabbat, we read from the Torah about the dramatic Exodus of the Israelites from Egypt. Upon their deliverance into Sinai, their first act was to proclaim their thanks to G-d — through song [http://bible.ort.org/bible/htm/exodus/penta/ch15.htm]. From that biblical Song of the Sea to today's contemporary music, the Jewish people have always had a loving relationship with song. Today, we'll look at those links on the Jewish Highway.

There are many places where you can read up on your favourite singers and musicians and listen to some of their music, too. Take a look at the Jewish Music Home Page [http://www.jewishmusic.com/] with links to the home pages of David Broza, Debbie Friedman, Chava Alberstein and the late Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach. Over at the Shema Yisrael Torah Network-Jewish Jukebox [http://www.shemayisrael.com/music/], you'll find links to Avrohom Fried, Paul Zim and the Marvelous Midos Machine. And don't miss the Jewish Music Network [http://www.jewish-music.com/]. The Network has information about new releases and concerts and best of all, a generous sampling of audio files in the RealAudio format [http://www.realaudio.com/products/player/download.html].

For more selections of Sephardi and Chabad music, go to [http://www.613.org/music/niggun.html]. And for a very good overview about the special importance music plays in chassidic life, see Velvel Pasternak's essay at [http://www.jewishmusic.com/] and click on the Articles button.

Sure, listening to music is nice but if you prefer to raise your own voice in song, take a look at Jewish music Service/Song Archive [http://www.netspace.org/~dmacks/shira/]. This is a large archive of Hebrew lyrics translated and transliterated into English characters. The song selection is quite varied; you'll find everything from Adon Olam to Yerushalayim Shel Zahav to mourner's Kaddish. The files are in ".rtf" format which can be read by most word processors. Instructions for using the Archive are very clear and can be found at [http://www.netspace.org/~dmacks/shira/usage.html].

Singers of Jewish music will also want to take a look at Ne'ima Online, a network of university-based Jewish a cappella groups [http://www.neima.org/index.html]. And I was fascinated to come across the Web page for Nigun: The Society for the Promotion and Exploration of Jewish Music — based in Germany [http://stil.uni-duisburg.de/Nigun/English/].

If you want to meet other lovers of Jewish music, check out both the Usenet newsgroup [alt.music.jewish] and the Jewish-Music mailing list. To subscribe to the list, send an e-mail to: [listsproc@shamash.org] with the one-line message: subscribe jewish-music YourFirstName YourLastName. Leave the subject line blank. You can find a large archive of past correspondence at [gopher://www.shamash.org:70/hh/lists/jewish-music].

In this column, I have not dwelt on singers and musicians who happen to be Jewish. However, I do recommend taking a look at the Website Bob Dylan: Tangled Up in Jews [http://www.well.com/user/yudel/Dylan.html], a page "devoted to studying and collecting trivia relating to the Jewish religious/cultural odyssey of Shabtai Zisel ben Avraham, a.k.a Bob Dylan." Not only has Larry Yudelson charted Dylan's Jewish journey of discovery, he's also included Hebrew lyrics for Blowin' in the Wind. [http://www.well.com/user/yudel/Dylheb3.html]

No survey of Jewish music would be complete without looking at Klezmer music. Ari Davidow has done a magnificent job with Klez Picks site [http://www.well.com/user/ari/klez/]. You'll find everything from articles on the hottest Klezmer bands, a Klezmer Top Ten list and a huge list [http://www.well.com/user/ari/klez/klezcontacts.html] of Klezmer bands on the Web. Everything from the Klezmatics, Di Ganeyvim and What the Chelm to the groups Kreplach, Tzimmes and Lox & Vodka.

Which reminds me...I must do a column on Jewish cooking on the Internet. But next time — Israeli music.

Manitoban, Israeli work on space medicine research

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Kevin Forkheim's first visit to Israel over the December break has further solidified his working relationship with Israeli colleague, Eran Schenker.

"I learned a little more about Israeli space research, too," says the 25-year-old University of Manitoba medical student. "To my knowledge, ours is the first joint collaboration between Israelis and Canadians in space medicine research."

Forkheim and Schenker met last summer at the International Space University in Vienna. The Manitoba student received a scholarship to attend from the Canadian Space Agency and was also sponsored by the Medical Research Council, the Israel Space Agency and the Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem. There were about 10 students from 35 countries enrolled at the university.

In Vienna, Forkheim and Schenker collaborated on an experiment to test human bone deterioration in a weightless environment as well as a second experiment to measure the development of mice embryos in space. Their experiments were chosen for the November American space shuttle mission by Instrumentation Technology Associates of Pennsylvania, a computer hardware research company that puts together the experiments for the astronauts.

"Russian scientists say that a body on an extended mission in space can lose up to 19 percent of bone mass," Forkheim explains. "We hoped to learn why osteoblasts don't function as they do on earth. The astronauts were able to culture bone cells in the shuttle. We will be using electron microscopes and light microscopy to see if we can spot any particular changes that will point to why the osteoblasts are not functioning as they should. The information that is gleaned may help point to explanations as to how osteoporosis occurs on earth."

The mouse embryos didn't fare well. Rather than developing, the cells degenerated. Among the factors that may have been responsible for the outcome, Forkheim suggests microgravity, cosmic radiation or vibrations from the shuttle.

"It appears that mammals at present are only capable of developing in an earth-like environment," he concludes.

In Israel, Forkheim divided his time primarily between the University of Tel Aviv Medical Centre and Hadassah Hospital.

He is looking forward to more joint research projects between the University of Manitoba and the two Israeli institutions. He notes that the International Space Station, on which construction will start in November, will provide opportunities for space medicine and other researchers around the world to work together.

Exercise coach says disability no barrier to a healthier life

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Beverley Burdeyney is living proof that her "fitness with a difference" philosophy can overcome disabilities and lead to a healthier life.

It is hard to believe that Burdeney, a grandmother in her mid-50s who is also a personal exercise coach, has spina bifida. Youthful and energetic, she presents a regal appearance. She says the realization that she could overcome her disability gave her the motivation to leave a successful position in the corporate world 12 years ago to help others.

"This has given me an awareness of people's special needs and the importance of not merely exercising but tailoring exercise programs to the special needs and limitations of each of my clients," says Burdeyney. "And as a world traveller, I developed an exercise program requiring no heavy equipment — and it needs only a limited space."

The crux of the problem for most people, she explains, is body alignment. "Structure governs function. If you are out of alignment, and this has led to a permanent imbalance, incorrect activities and exercises may lead to even greater problems."

Her exercise programs do not include any aerobics, Burdeyney says, because she feels that aerobics puts too much stress on the joints and increases the risk of injury.

Many of her clients have come to her through recommendations from medical doctors, chiropractors or therapists and she says she is proud of her success with people who have been injured or suffer post-operation limitations and stroke victims. But most of her clients come for strengthening and correction of minor conditions.

Her method is based on the "pelvic tilt," which she says enables you to bring your body together as a single unit. It develops good posture and it will improve your health and body functioning.

She stresses the importance of an in-depth assessment. It is crucial, she says, because individuals require some body adjustment and an awareness of their weaknesses before they can work up to a successful program based on building up their own dynamic central stability girdle in the pelvis, abdomen and lower back areas.

"This is the foundation of the body and if it is strong and solid, the other body parts automatically will be stacked correctly and perform accordingly."

She says most people deteriorate in the lumbar (lower back) region. The consequences may include flabby buttocks, dowager's hump, double chins, over-stretched and weakened stomach muscles, complications with internal organs or congested chest.

Following the initial assessment by Burdeyney, who comes to your home or office, clients can choose to continue an exercise program on their own with periodic assessments of their progress, or to continue their 45-minute individualized workouts with Burdeyney in private sessions.

She says many individuals get into an exercise class, golf, play tennis or engage in some other activity and develop an injury.

"They have not prepared their bodies to take the stress. A qualified trainer and chiropractor should be available at clubs," she feels.

By loosening, strengthening and stretching all of your principal areas, you will reshape your body, revitalize your life, change your body symmetry and improve breathing and other functions.

"My ultimate aim is to make my clients independent of me, to make sure they end up with a safe, efficient, portable program which they can do themselves."

PM denies allegation of secret deal on appointee

BY NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Allegations of government misconduct have led to denials from Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and a call from at least one government minister for Israel Television to be shut down if the charges prove false.

As word of the alleged misconduct filled the Israeli media, the country's highest prosecutor ordered a police investigation into alleged corruption surrounding the short-lived appointment of Jerusalem lawyer Roni Bar-On as attorney general.

"The supreme national interest required that we uncover the true circumstances of the appointment," Edna Arbel, state attorney and acting attorney general, said after consultations with senior police officials.

Word of the police investigation came amid reports that Elyakim Rubinstein, a Jerusalem District Court judge, who is widely respected in legal and political circles, had agreed to become Israel's next attorney general.

The allegations surrounding Bar-On's appointment surfaced last week, when Israel Television reported that the Shas Party, which has two ministers in the government and 10 seats in the Knesset, had promised to back the Hebron agreement when it came before the cabinet and parliament earlier this month in exchange for Bar-On's appointment.

According to the report, Bar-On in turn agreed to a plea bargain for Shas Knesset member Aryeh Deri, who is on trial for bribery, fraud and breach of public trust.

Netanyahu flatly denied the charges, calling for a police investigation into the allegations.

Two days after the cabinet approved his appointment as attorney general earlier this month, Bar-On turned down the position.

Bar-On, a Likud activist, had come under intense criticism from government and legal circles, which charged that he had gotten the appointment because of his political loyalties and close association with Justice Minister Tzachi Hanegbi.

Bar-On had been picked to replace Michael Ben-Yair, who announced his resignation in December.

Police investigators met with officials from Israel Television, who said they would not compromise their journalistic ethics to reveal the sources of their report.

When launching the probe, Arbel instructed police investigators to obtain the evidence on which Israel Television based its report, by court order if necessary.

"If the claims are not true, then the television must be closed down," Tourism Minister Moshe Katsav was quoted as saying.

Asked what should be done if the allegations were proven true, Katsav told reporters, "In that case, the government does not have the right to exist."

Deri denied in a Channel 2 Television interview any truth to the claims, adding that he has been hounded by the media for the past seven years.

Rubinstein nominated as attorney general

By EVELYN GORDON AND LIAT COLLINS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Jerusalem District Court Judge Elyakim Rubinstein will be the next attorney-general, Justice Minister Tzahi Hanegbi has announced.

The appointment must be approved by the cabinet, which is to meet for that purpose this week. Rubinstein is expected to win easy approval.

Hanegbi said Supreme Court Justice, Aharon Barak, has also given the appointment his blessing.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu congratulated Rubinstein and said, "The appointment will add a great deal of honor and integrity to the Israeli legal system."

Rubinstein was rumored to be the government's first choice for the attorney-generalship even before the appointment of Roni Bar-On, but he was reportedly not interested in the job. After the Bar-On fiasco, however, Hanegbi approached him again, and Rubinstein agreed to take the job.

Hanegbi said he thought Rubinstein's appointment would "strengthen the rule of law in Israel and make an important contribution to the legal system."

The proposed appointment of Rubinstein was greeted warmly in political circles. Knesset Law Committee Chairman Shaul Yahalom (National Religious Party) said "We are talking about the right man, who was elected to the right position at the right time to bring about the desired calm in the country's judiciary."

Meretz leader Yossi Sarid praised the appointment, saying "He is a man of experience and integrity and is as deserving of this esteemed position."

Rubinstein, 50, was involved in the Camp David negotiations with Egypt, and in 1981 became the Foreign Ministry's legal adviser. He later did a stint as political counsellor at Israel's Embassy in Washington, and was eventually appointed cabinet secretary in 1986.

Rubinstein served as cabinet secretary for seven and a half years, under both Likud prime minister Yitzhak Shamir and Labor prime ministers Shimon Peres and Yitzhak Rabin. In 1991, Shamir appointed him to head the Madrid peace talks with the Palestinians and Jordanians, and Rabin kept him on as head of talks with the Jordanians after the Oslo Accords were signed.

Rubinstein finally resigned as cabinet secretary in April 1994, reportedly because he was upset at having been left in the dark over the Oslo Accords. He then served as the Defence Ministry's legal adviser until his appointment to the Jerusalem District Court in June 1995.

39 YEARS OF SUCCESS

WJC seeks heirs of victims for unclaimed accounts

By DANIEL KURTZMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — The World Jewish Congress (WJC) is looking for the heirs of 53 Polish Holocaust victims whose Swiss bank accounts were declared ownerless and turned over to the Polish government after World War II.

Switzerland last week released a detailed list of the account holders, many of whom died in Nazi death camps.

The move is significant because it marks the first time that the Swiss government has handed over the names of Swiss bank accounts belonging to Jews from the Holocaust era.

The release of the list followed an official Swiss report issued last month showing that Switzerland used dormant Jewish accounts to pay Poland 464,000 Swiss francs in 1975. The money – worth between $4 million and $5 million (US) today – was transferred under a pact that settled Swiss claims for property seized by Poland's post-war Communist regime.

"These assets were illegally and immorally seized by the Swiss government, and then illegally and immorally transferred to the Communist Polish regime," said Kalman Sultanik, vice-president of the WJC.

Switzerland never supplied the account holders' names at the time, and Poland simply deposited the money into its treasury without searching for heirs.

The list, released this week by the WJC, cites heirs for many of the account holders, as well as contact addresses in such cities as Paris, New York and Haifa.

Switzerland began reviewing its pact with Poland – as well as a similar deal with Hungary – after U.S. Senate banking committee chair Alfonse D'Amato (R-NY) accused Bern of using unclaimed Jewish accounts to pay off Swiss citizens whose assets were seized by the Communists after the war.

Thomas Borer, head of a Swiss task force on the country's wartime financial role, said Switzerland also intends to ask Hungary to provide a similar list of Jewish account holders. Bern agreed to pay Hungary 325,000 francs in 1975 under a similar arrangement, which is worth between $3 million and $4 million today.

After Switzerland's decision to release the once-secret list of names, Sultanik hailed it as "a very positive step" and commended the Polish government, which, he said, "pressed the Swiss government very hard on this issue."

Those seeking more information about the Swiss bank accounts belonging to Polish Holocaust victims can write to the World Jewish Congress, Attn: Polish Account Claim, 501 Madison Ave., New York, NY, 10022.

Swiss announce compensation fund

WASHINGTON — After months of resistance, Switzerland has agreed to set up a fund to begin compensating Holocaust victims and their heirs whose assets disappeared into the Swiss banking system during the World War II era.

Special Ambassador Thomas Borer, head of a Swiss task force on the country's wartime financial role, announced the decision last Thursday, after discussions with Swiss banking officials, the central bank, insurance companies and other businesses.

"We certainly hope that this will be understood as a sign of our goodwill," Borer told reporters in Zurich. "All the major banks support this idea, as well as other companies."

The decision comes as Switzerland continues to reel in the face of allegations that it hoarded the wealth of Holocaust victims while helping to finance the Nazi war effort.

Borer said the government and Swiss banks have yet to arrive at a fixed amount for the fund. "It would be premature to bring numbers into play," he said.

However, one of Switzerland's top bankers, Credit Suisse chair, Rainer Gut, called for a Holocaust memorial fund in excess of $100 million.

The World Jewish Congress (WJC) welcomed the Swiss decision, which comes six weeks after WJC President Edgar Bronfman publicly called on Switzerland to make a "good faith financial gesture" to Holocaust survivors and the world Jewish community.

"The principle is one we have long endorsed," said Elan Steinberg, WJC's executive director. "We expect and hope in the next few days to begin the process of cooperating and working out the precise details."

U.S. Senate banking committee chair Alfonse D'Amato called the Swiss plan a "step in the right direction."

"It is troubling that it took so long," D'Amato said. "It is a relief that it happened at all."

PM adapts to reality

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Benjamin Netanyahu has begun to march to a different drummer, and if he hews to the new path he has embarked upon, Israeli politics may never be the same again.

By agreeing to redeploy from Hebron and to commit himself to three unspecified withdrawals from the West Bank over the next 18 months, Netanyahu has personally embraced the Oslo peace process and moved toward the centre of the political map, thereby distancing himself from the Revisionist Zionist philosophy which formed him and breaking ranks with Likud party faithful.

In one bold stroke, Netanyahu has, in effect, accepted the land-for-peace formula (at least on the Palestinian front), recognized the inevitability of partition in the historic land mass known as Palestine and jettisoned the ideology of Greater Israel.

In a startling transformation, he has begun to reinvent himself as a pragmatist in a party awash with blinkered diehard ideologues like Benny Begin and Ariel Sharon. Netanyahu claims that he has not abandoned Likud ideals, but in the same breath he acknowledges that Israel faces a "different reality."

It is quite an admission from a man who mercilessly attacked the Oslo accords before last May's general election, who wrote that the West Bank is a "protective wall" which cannot be given up and who blithely assumed that Israel could force its will upon the Palestinians and the Arab world.

The nationalist camp, which includes the National Religious Party and Tsomet, had high hopes for Netanyahu, the son of a radical Revisionist whose views were to the right of Menachem Begin. He would slow down, if not reverse, the Oslo process, initiated by the Labor party. He would build new settlements in Judea and Samaria, the construction of which would reinforce Israel's claims to these lands and block the emergence of a Palestinian state.

But what the zealots failed to realize was that Netanyahu, his personal views notwithstanding, was elected on a platform of "peace with security." Far from rejecting a peaceful solution of the Arab-Israeli dispute, the Israeli electorate gave him a mandate to proceed cautiously. They did not hand him a carte blanche to wreck the peace process and bring Israel into a needless armed confrontation with the Arabs. And for all his egregious blunders, Netanyahu has taken the mandate seriously, professing his commitment to the peace process.

At this point, no one can be certain where Netanyahu is taking the country. What proportion of the West Bank will he relinquish to the Palestinians? Will he agree to further withdrawals from the Gaza Strip? Will he tolerate the existence of a demilitarized Palestinian state with limited powers? Will he make a deal with Syria over the Golan Heights and free Israel from the bloody burden of occupying southern Lebanon?

These are questions that can only be answered in the fullness of time. But to the far right, the verdict is already in: Netanyahu has betrayed the cause. Purists such as Yitzhak Shamir, the former prime minister, and Hanan Porat, a leader of the National Religious Party, have openly called for his resignation.

In particular, they have accused Netanyahu of producing an agreement in Hebron that is substantially no better than the one negotiated by Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres. In general, they have accused Netanyahu of leading Israel toward disaster. Right-wing extremists, meanwhile, have phoned in death threats, once again reminding Israelis of the Yigal Amirs, the Baruch Goldsteins and the Noam Friedmans in their midst.

Clearly, Netanyahu has a rough road ahead of him. The challenges are daunting, the risks are great. "I don't envy Netanyahu," Yair Lapid wrote in Ma'ariv recently. "The left doesn't forgive him for what he was. The right doesn't forgive him for what he will become."

Canada's voting record in UN

On Nov. 14, the General Assembly, acting on a recommendation of the Third Committee, which deals with economic, social and cultural matters, adopted a resolution on the right of the Palestinians to self-determination. Canada joined 158 nations in voting "yes." Israel and the United States cast "no" ballots. Nine countries abstained.

On Nov. 27, Canada abstained on a resolution supported by 104 members and opposed by Israel and the United States, endorsing the work of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People.

On the same day, two similar resolutions were passed by the General Assembly. On these, Canada abstained and voted "yes."

On Nov. 29, the General Assembly declared that "all legislative and administrative measures and actions taken by Israel...to alter Jerusalem's character and status... were null and void." The measure was adopted by a 148-1 margin, with 13 abstentions.

On Dec. 2, the General Assembly called on Israel to withdraw from the Golan Heights, to the June 4, 1967 border. The resolution, opposed by Israel and the United States, was supported by 84 states. Canada was among 71 countries which abstained.

Canada and Israel threw their weight behind a Dec. 2 resolution expressing full support for the Middle Eastern peace process. Syria, Lebanon and Iran cast negative ballots.

A Dec. 4 resolution describing Israel's settlements as illegal and calling for the withdrawal of Israeli forces from the territories, was backed by Canada as well as 151 states.

On Dec. 10, the General Assembly called for the creation of a nuclear weapon-free zone in the Middle East and urged all countries there to place their nuclear facilities under International Atomic Energy Agency safeguards. Canada, along with 154 others, voted "yes." There were eight abstentions. Israel and the United States voted "no."

Also on Dec. 10, the General Assembly invited Israel to sign the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons. Canada abstained. Israel voted "no."

On Dec. 16, the General Assembly voiced concern at "the exploitation" by Israel of the natural resources of the territories. Canada, among 112 others, supported the resolution.

Canada backed three resolutions on Dec. 13 dealing with the Palestinians. The resolutions recognized the efforts of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA) for Palestinan refugees, drew attention to the plight of such persons and recommended the distribution of grants and scholarships to Palestinian students. Israel cast two "nos" and one abstention.

Also on Dec. 13, Canada voted "yes" for resolutions regarding the operations of UNRWA, Palestinian refugees' property, the need for a Palestinian university in Jerusalem and Israeli human practices and settlements in the territories.

Israel's 1981 decision to impose its laws and administration on the Golan, captured in the Six Day War, was declared null and void in a Dec. 13 resolution supported by Canada and 152 other countries.

A resolution dealing exclusively with Lebanon was passed in April, during Israel's massive bombardment of Lebanon (Operation Grapes of Wrath).

Calling on Israel to cease firing and to withdraw its forces from all Lebanese territory, the resolution was opposed by Israel and the United States.

Canada abstained.

the first promise Arafat made to then prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, in the famous exchange of letters in September 1993. Two years later, in the September 1995 Interim Agreement, a deadline was finally attached to this promise: The covenant was to be amended no later than two months after the inauguration of the Palestinian Council, or May 7, 1996.

On April 24, 1996, the Palestine National Council (PNC) approved a resolution to "amend the National Charter by cancelling the articles that are contrary to the letters exchanged between the PLO and the government of Israel on September 9 and 10, 1993," the GPO noted. It also authorized establishment of a legal subcommittee to "redraft the National Charter."

However, the GPO said, the resolution to amend the charter has no validity under internationally recognized legal principles, because it did not specify which articles of the covenant were amended. Amendments to a legal document are only legally valid if they are properly approved by an authorized body which knows exactly what the changes in question are, the GPO said.

In this case, it was clear that nobody knew what the changes in question were, since even the PNC members could not agree afterwards on what was or was not changed, the GPO noted.

Finally, the GPO said, the PLO reaffirmed its commitment to "complete the process of revising the Palestinian National Charter" in the note for the record accompanying the Hebron agreement.

Exhibit explores Jewish presence in Brescia

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Iron and Star, an exhibit exploring the Jewish presence in Brescia, Italy, during the Renaissance, attracted substantial representation from the Italian and Jewish communities when it opened on a bitterly cold night at the Instituto Italiano di Cultura.

Curated by Humanities Prof. Franco Bontempi of Italy, the exhibit is sponsored in Toronto by the Institute and co-sponsored by the Circolo San Alessandro, Bescia. It opened here under the auspices of the Consul General of Italy, Leonardo Sampoli.

Presented in cities throughout Italy and at a major museum in Jerusalem, it was first seen on this continent at the Yeshiva University Museum in New York before coming to Toronto.

Instituto director Dr. Francesca Valente, describes the comprehensive exhibit as a "bridge between the Italian and Jewish communities." It focuses on the strong Jewish community in the northern Italian town of Brescia, which dates back to the early Roman Empire about 100 BCE and reached its peak during the Renaissance.

Brought to the Alpine region by Julius Caesar, mainly as slaves who later gained their freedom, the Jewish people adapted to the economic realities of the land which, though not suited to agriculture, produced rich iron deposits, the backbone of the Italian economy and in demand across the Middle East. Therefore, the exhibit title, Iron for the mineral and Star for the Star of David, reflecting Jewish identity.

In addition to mining (they developed the first smelter in the country) and trading, the Jewish population built paper mills and became active in the clothing trade. Less popular was money lending which led to criticism of Jewish influence.

The community flourished with a synagogue, a talmudic school considered the best in Italy and a workshop of scribes.

Purim and Chanukah were celebrated, there were weddings and a Jewish cemetery was put in place. Attitudes toward the Jewish presence varied. Intellectuals translated Jewish works including an edition of a Talmudic treatise and also compiled a grammar and dictionary. Brescia astrological thought had close relations with Jewish traditions.

However, in neighboring Trento, the age old accusation of ritual murder surfaced and precipitated a trial. The scare tactic spilled over into Brescia.

The ruling powers during the Renaissance were alternately Venice and Milan. Jews were banished from Brescia in 1572 as a result of a revolutionary atmosphere at the time and the powerful Venetian stance during the Battle of Lepanto. But in 1588 the community was re-established.

The extremely well annotated exhibit details through records, frescoes, artifacts, engravings and text, the economic, social and religious aspects of a remarkable community which was viable for 2,000 years.

The Jewish community in Brescia ceased to exist in 1918 says Prof. Bontempi but Jews continue to live there.

The exhibition runs weekdays through to Feb. 20, 2-5 p.m. at the Institute, 496 Huron St., Toronto, (one block north of Bloor St.).

New Matthau film a delightful comedy

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Walter Matthau

Mainstream Hollywood films do not ordinarily begin with a scene in Yiddish. But in I'm Not Rappaport, this is precisely what happens.

In a flashback, set in New York City in the early part of this century, a Jewish union leader named Feigenbaum (Ron Rifkin) tries to rouse a group of disaffected workers. They remain impassive until a fiery young militant named Clara Lemlich (Elina Lowensohn) rises from her chair and, in pungent Yiddish, calls for an immediate strike. As she speaks, a mesmerized boy lost in the crowd looks on with astonishment and admiration.

At this point, five minutes into the movie, I'm Not Rappaport fast-forwards to the present. The boy, Nat Moyer (Walter Matthau), is a grizzled old Jewish radical, a mischievous Walter Mittyesque figure with a penchant for constantly reinventing himself and insinuating himself into the lives of strangers.

Nat, played wonderfully by Matthau, spends much of his day on a bench in Manhattan's Central Park, pestering his reluctant companion, a black superintendent named Midge (Ossie Davis) who's his polar opposite.

From his perch in the leafy park, Nat philosophizes, performs good deeds and spins fanciful stories. "Sometimes the truth doesn't fit," he acknowledges. " I take in here, I let out there, till it fits."

Assuming the personalities of fictional characters, Nat by turns transforms himself into a crusading consumer advocate, a Cuban spy, a canny lawyer, a detective, a gangster and a movie mogul-cum-rabbi.

But in his greatest role as a loveable imposter, he pretends to be the father of an illegitimate daughter who, he claims, is a sergeant in the Israeli army. He fabricates this outlandish tale to appease his real daughter (Amy Irving), who's intent on controlling her father's runaway impulses.

I'm Not Rappaport, based on an acclaimed Broadway play, is at first slightly amusing. But as it picks up steam, and as Matthau grows into his persona, it becomes downright hilarious.

Now playing at Cineplex Odeon theatres, I'm Not Rappaport is a delightful comedy with an endearing Jewish flavor.

Of Shakespeare, Anne Frank & Achad Ha'am

The Bard Is Barred

The European Monetary Institute has decided not to put Shakespeare's face on Euro banknotes, largely because of the bard's perpetually controversial depiction of Shylock, the Jewish moneylender in The Merchant of Venice, according to a report in the London Jewish Chronicle.

Several proposed designs for the single pan-European currency were released recently, showing bridges, gates and windows, together with maps of Europe. The designs are expected to be finalized in 1998 and the currency to enter circulation in 2000.

The decision not to use Shakespeare's image on the banknotes is "ludicrous," said British-Jewish playwright Bernard Kops. "If any writer deserves to be on a banknote, it is Shakespeare," he said. "He was most enlightened and gave a very sympathetic portrait of the Jew."

Travel Talk

EXPLORING THE YUCATAN

If the Yucatan peninsula may be said to jut into the Caribbean Ocean like a sore thumb, the glittering resort town of Cancun may be subjectively likened to a hangnail on that thumb.

A quarter-century ago, Cancun was little more than swamp and jungle. A byproduct of the jumbo jet, Cancun is the embodiment of glitz, as unrepresentative of the surrounding scrub rain forest as Las Vegas is of the desert.

By car from the airport, one may easily ride for 45 minutes, seeing only hotels, restaurants (including the ubiquitous Planet Hollywood) and shopping malls.

Monumental luxury hotels built by Hilton, Hyatt Regency, Marriott, Westin and other top-end chains grace the city's so-called Hotel Zone.

The shops, filled with sombreros, jewelry, blankets, native crafts and other consumer goods, seem pricey. Cancun's famous beaches are its most popular attraction by day, but after dark atmospheric restaurants, swank nightclubs and sparkling discos take over. They, too, seem pricey.

After a few days, Cancun's artificiality may become as irritating as an irksome hangnail. That's when it's time to rent a jeep, hop on a bus or take a short charter flight to some of the peninsula's lesser-known but far more genuine attractions.

Highway 307 is an unerringly straight and level two-lane biway hacked out of the bush. This road is the artery of the Tulum Corridor, a freshly developed tourist area of sparkling beaches, coastal villages, tourist attractions, resorts and Mayan ruins.

Some 90 minutes away by car is the coastal temple of Tulum, the only edifice the Mayans built by the sea. A priestly enclave set high on a promontory, Tulum was the focal point of a thriving walled city-state in the jungle that thrived until the coming of the Spanish.

As at other temples in the region — Uxmal, Palenque, Chichen-Itza, Coba — the Mayans practised human sacrifice here. Each day the high priest would extract the heart from a living virgin in a matter of seconds, then hold up the still-palpitating organ triumphantly as if to appease the sun. The practice appalled even the cold-blooded conquistadors.

Xcaret (pronounced Ish-car'-et) is a $17-million amusement park situated midway between Cancun and Tulum. Although Disneyesque in conception and scope, Xcaret caters to the ecological ethos of the 1990s. One may float lazily down an underground river or swim with gentle and intelligent bottlenose dolphins.

Xcaret's wild bird aviary and saltwater aquarium provide insight into the region's wildlife and its 26 models of Mayan ceremonial sites illuminate the vanished civilization that still defines the region's soul. Xcaret bills itself as "nature's sacred paradise," and its adult admission fee of about $30 Canadian shows that paradise doesn't come cheap.

Coba, once a major Mayan city with extensive trade connections, is situated inland. Its two towering temple ruins and various pre-Hispanic elevated roads date from its heyday about 1,200 years ago. Largely overgrown with jungle, Coba is more accessible to wild boars and monkeys than to people. It's a good spot to view local birds and butterflies.

For snorkellers, the Tulum Corridor offers Xel-Ha ("Shell-Hah") National Park, a natural area of lagoons and caves along the rocky shore. A Cancun in miniature, the coastal town of Playa del Carmen offers shops, restaurants, deluxe hotels and an 18-hole golf course.

Even the Yucatan's most spectacular ruins in Chichen-Itza are accessible from Cancun. Chichen-Itza is 2½ hours away by road but only a short charter flight away and thus a popular destination for day-trippers.

Canadian firm buys part of Phoenica Glass

By GALIT LIPKIS BECK
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Canadian-based Consumer Packaging Inc. (CPI), a leading producer of glass containers, has signed a partnership agreement to purchase 25.1 percent of Phoenicia Glass Works, a fully owned subsidiary of Koor Industries, for $5.8 million, the company informed the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange.

The agreement marks CPI's first investment in the Middle East. The firm intends to expand activities into other countries in the region in its strategy to become a multinational corporation.

CPI is the market share leader and only glass container producer in Canada. The company, in partnership with Owens-Brockway Glass Container, recently signed an agreement to buy Anchor, one of the largest producers of glass bottles and jars in the United States. Completion of the transaction will turn CPI into the third largest glass firm in the world with an annual sales turnover of about $1.6 billion.

The pact was signed in Canada last Wednesday.

TORONTO — An international hockey game between Israel and Yugoslavia turned ugly when repeated anti-Semitic insults led to an end-of-game brawl at a recent IIHF under-20 junior tournament in Sofia, Bulgaria.

Epithets of "dirty Jew" and "we're going to finish what Hitler started" prompted the angry Israeli reaction, said Oded Orgil, who accompanied the team to Sofia for an IIHF Pool D tournament. Twice in the middle of the game, the Israeli captain, Ran Oz, approached the referee to complain about the comments but he was shooed away both times. The referee did not speak English and the linesmen, who did, refused to intervene, Orgil said.

Later in the game Oz decided to take matters into his own hands and cross-checked the Yugoslav player. He was thrown out of the game and when the Israeli assistant captains "tried to talk to the referee, he refused to listen. At that point, the boys on the bench got very upset," Orgil said.

With 10 minutes to go in the game and Israel trailing 6-4, Yugoslav players made more anti-Semitic comments (coupled with aggravating stickwork), leading to pushing and shoving on the ice. Then, with the Israelis down two men, the Yugoslavs put the game out of reach. They went on to win 9-4.

When the final buzzer sounded and the benches emptied, five or more fights broke out, with the remaining players "dancing" around the ice, Orgil said. Afterwards in the dressing room, head coach Sergei Martin upbraided the youngsters for fighting, but some Israeli players shouted back that he had not lost relatives in the Holocaust.

Surprisingly, no sanctions were imposed on Israel by the tournament directorate. At a directorate meeting, composed of representatives of the competing countries, Israel complained about the outrageous anti-Semitic remarks, the referee's unwillingness to deal with them and the fact the ref could not and would not communicate with the Israeli team, even in English, Orgil said.

Orgil, a member of Israel's national senior team, said for many of the boys it was their first taste of blatant anti-Semitism. Composed of players from Israel and of Canadians who have or whose parents have Israeli passports, they were not used to experiencing such Jew-hatred.

While some may consider them wrong for taking matters into their own hands, "for them it was a matter of self-respect. Sometimes you've got to take a stand for principle. You may lose the battle, but in the long run, you win the war. I think the boys from Yugoslavia may think twice about starting up anti-Semitism with Jews," Orgil said.

The game against Yugoslavia was Israel's second of the tournament. Also participating in the IIHF-sponsored event were teams from Estonia and South Africa, which together with Israel and Yugoslavia, comprised one of two divisions in Pool D. Teams from Lithuania, Spain, Bulgaria and Mexico, which made its first appearance an IIHF event, rounded out the division.

Orgil accompanied 11 players from Toronto and one from Saskatchewan (a Russian-born Israeli who plays junior B hockey there) to bolster the Israeli lineup. Some of the players were also on last year's under-18 team that won for Israel its first-ever medal in Pool D international hockey, a bronze. The year before, in the same tournament, they finished fifth out of seven teams.

Ron Soreanu, 16, is a veteran of last year's bronze medal team. A defenceman with Goulding Park Rangers, a AA minor midget team, Soreanu was on the ice when the fights broke out. In fact, he paired off with a Yugoslav player who earlier in the game had hacked at the Israeli goalie. He said the team got angry when Oz described the anti-Semitic remarks to them on the bench and coupled with the cheap-shot stickwork they endured during the game, that prompted the outbreak of fisticuffs.

"A lot of the Yugoslavs" made insulting remarks and "we wanted to do what's right for our team," he said.

Ron Berman, Soreanu's teammate with Goulding Park, said one Yugoslav player called him a "dirty Jew" during a faceoff near the end of the game. When the teams hit the ice after the final buzzer, he too was involved in a fight —with that same Yugoslav player. "I got him back," the 16-year-old right winger said, "but I'm still pretty angry we lost the game."

As in previous years, Israel opened the tournament slowly — and without a single practice together. The Estonians, many of whom are major junior calibre according to Berman, clobbered them 11-3. The team, feeling opening game jitters and playing on the big ice for the first time, fell behind 5-0 in the first 10 minutes.

The juniors were also hampered by a problem that has plagued Israeli hockey teams for years — disagreement over what style to play when the team is made up of skaters who've been trained in Canadian hockey as well as those who learned the Russian style. Martin and his assistant Boris Mendel, both Soviet olim, wanted the boys to play a skating, no-hitting game while most of the players, including those born in Israel, wanted to play a more physical, Canadian style, Orgil said.

"It's a totally different style and it's hard to switch over," said Berman, who had six goals in the tournament.

The Canadian-trained players got to play more their own way in game 3 against South Africa, which was coached by a Canadian. Israel won 7-2 and the score was indicative of the play. Goalie Avi Gleeck had a strong game and Israel was better in all facets of the game, Orgil said.

Game 4 was against the host Bulgarians, a cross-over match to determine fifth and sixth places. Israel won 7-3 as their performance continued to improve. The Israelis were physically stronger, played a better game all-round and got strong netminding from Sergei Ostrovski, a Russian-born player who lives in Israel. "It was a good, workmanlike effort," Orgil said.

For Soreanu, the victory was especially sweet, since the Bulgarians had been standing by the boards and cheering on the Yugoslavs during their altercation with Israel. "We all connected, I guess," he said of the final effort that evened the Israelis' record at 2-2.

Berman and Soreanu raved about the experience of representing Israel at an international tournament.

"I played last year in the under-18 tournament and I didn't think this year would be a big deal," Berman said. "But once you step on the ice, you get a feeling of pride... You get this extra momentum boost and even when you're tired you work hard." When your team scores a goal, the bench erupts in wild cheers, he added.

Centre Alon Eizenman was named Israel's most valuable player of the tournament. Other players who joined the team from Canada included: Gleeck, Soreanu, Berman, Jason Goldberg, Simon Levine, Brad Bloch, Mark Joseph, Jason Shiff, Yaron Orgil and Eli Oosterhuis. Canadian Jeff Budd, who works at the Canada Centre rink in Metulla, served as the team's manager.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

Since my Dad was admitted to the hospital for minor surgery, there has been a dramatic change in his behavior. He was somewhat forgetful before, but now has periods where he is a different person. He has become very aggressive and now they are treating him with medication that makes him act like a zombie. He was diagnosed as an Alzheimer's victim. I can't accept the change in him. He was always the strong one in the family.

RS

Dear RS,

I am really sorry that you have to face the difficult realities that come with that diagnosis. There are many opportunities to learn more about Alzheimer's disease. It will not change your father's condition but it will help you and your family learn to deal with some of the problems.

Please contact an association or agency that provides education and support groups. If this is not available, visit a health professional who has experience in this field.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

The Inside Back

'Nice to see Star of David flying proudly...'

By ALON EIZENMAN
Special to The CJN

Along with 18 others from Canada and Israel, I recently had the opportunity to represent Israel in the World Junior Hockey Championships, Pool D, in Bulgaria. The following is my account of what happened from the time we left Toronto until we returned 10 days later.

Alon Eizenman

Dec. 27: Today is departure day. We come to the airport excited, nervous and a little proud. This is the first time that Israel is sending a team to the under-20 World Championships, so we're heading into uncharted territory. Expectations are high for this team after the bronze medal performance put on by the under-18 team in Bulgaria last year. Those of us who have been to Bulgaria before know what the food is like, so we pack enough food to feed a medium-sized Caribbean country for a month. Simon Levine leads the team in that department. He's bringing about 40 pounds of food, as well as a portable heater.

We say good-bye to parents and siblings and board the plane. There are 14 of us coming from Canada — 11 players from Toronto, one transplanted Russian playing in Saskatchewan, our chaperone, Oded Orgil, and our trainer. The rest of the team coming from Israel will join us in Bulgaria on Sunday. So far, we all seem to get along. It promises to be a good trip.
Dec. 28: By the time we reach Frankfurt, the tedium of flying has eroded much of our excitement and optimism, and has left us feeling like we just want to get to Bulgaria so we can collapse into real beds.

Our exhaustion, coupled with the fact that it costs about $5 (US) for a can of pop, makes our three hour layover in Frankfurt pretty rough.

We land in Bulgaria safely. Unfortunately, eight of our bags do not make the trip with us. They will arrive later on, but not before giving us our first modest scare of the trip.

Our hotel, the Hotel Rodina, is nice — much nicer than we expected — but there's a catch. The hallways are heated and our rooms freezing cold.
Dec. 29: Now is the winter of our discontent. We awake to find that our rooms are still as cold as they were last night. On the plus side, we don't need refrigerators for all of the food we've brought.

The breakfast that they serve us is decidedly sub-par. Fortunately, some of us have brought breakfast cereals with us. We take the cereal down to the dining room and ask for milk. The waiter gladly obliges, bringing us pitchers of warm milk. We figure that we weren't specific enough, so we try again, this time explaining to him, in broken English and sign language, that we want cold milk. The waiter disappears and returns triumphantly with what we assume are pitchers of cold milk. They are actually the same jugs of warm milk with ice cubes in them!

Today is our practice day. We are supposed to practise in the morning and then meet the Israeli part of the team and practise with them in the afternoon, but things don't often go according to plan here. There is a strike at the airport in Tel Aviv and the nine Israelis (seven players, two coaches) will not arrive until later tonight. This means that we will not practise as a team at all, and the first time that we'll be on the ice together is in our first game. To make matters worse, our first game is against Estonia, the top-ranked team in the tournament.

I fear the worst for tomorrow. You can't expect a team to go out and play cold against anybody, let alone the big, bad Estonians.
Dec. 30: Today is the opening day of the tournament. Our first game, against Estonia, is at 10 a.m. It turns out that I have good reason to be worried. The score is 7-0 for the other guys before we know what has happened. Ron Berman gets our first goal of the tournament near the end of the first period, breaking their shutout, and saving a little face.

The rest of the game is more even as we adjust to their speed and passing, as well as to each other. However, for obvious reasons, we can't play an organized game, so we never threaten to make a comeback. This game can be classified as a learning experience.

After the game we go to eat at a very mediocre pizza joint across the street from the arena. We leave the waitress a 4,000-lev tip, or about $8 (US). For this to have any significance, you need to know that it is not customary to tip in Bulgaria; and the waitress makes about 10,000 lev a month. The woman is so overcome that she starts to cry.

The opening ceremonies take place today. They're a lot less exciting than the name "ceremony" suggests. Three guys from each team skate around the rink holding their country's flag, the tournament director makes a speech and the Bulgarian national anthem is played. Hardly enough to give me goosebumps, but it's still nice to see the Star of David flying proudly at the World Junior Hockey Championships.

We spend the rest of the day searching for food and heat. I hope tomorrow will be better.
Dec. 31: Today we have a chance to put yesterday's embarrassment behind us. Our opponent is Yugoslavia, a more talented but physically weaker team than we are.

We get off to a good start, scoring early in the first period. They tie the game before the first intermission. The second period is also pretty even, but a rash of stupid penalties allows them to score a few power play goals. The score at the end of the second is 5-3 in their favor.

They have been playing a dirty game up until this point, occasionally trying to perform unlicensed surgery on us using hockey sticks, but in the third period, they cross the line. They make anti-Semitic comments and insulting gestures at us, and apparently forget that hockey, although violent, is still a game, and games are inherently childlike and good. We try to ignore the Yugoslavs and just play hockey, but when your opponent says that he's going to kill you like Hitler, it's sort of difficult to focus on the game. We appeal to the referee, but he pays no attention until the 10-minute mark of the third, when our captain, Ran Oz, is ejected for trying to dismember a Yugoslav who said things that shouldn't be said.

The rest of the game is basically a slug-fest, where we no longer care if we win or lose; we just want to get as many punches and cheapshots in as we can before the final buzzer. Consequently, they score three more goals while we sit in the penalty box. The final score is 9-4.

However, the game is not quite over. As all of the players get off of their benches to line up for their national anthem, a brawl breaks out.

Although we lose the game, we make up for it in the fight, politely teaching our opponents a lesson in manners. Nothing can diminish the pride we have in our actions, our team and each other. I feel that we lost the game but won something more important.
Jan. 1: Happy New Year! Today is the relaxing day. We don't do much of anything except for hanging out and chillin', which are really the same thing. We have some real characters on this team, like Eli Oosterhuis, a phys-ed. student at U of T and one of the funniest kids I have ever met. Mark Joseph and Jason Goldberg, who both go to Western, are great guys and team leaders. Joseph is our toughest player, but Jason Shiff is up there as well. Ron Soreanu, one of the young guys on the team, gets more attention from the guys for his good looking sister than for his solid defensive play. Avi Gleeck, our goalie, is a clown from York University and Yaron Orgil is our grizzled veteran.

The guys from Israel are cool, but David Elbaz and Guy Peled, a transplanted Quebecer and a Californian respectively, are absolutely hilarious. Ran Oz and Nadav Even are our twin towers on defence.
Jan. 2: We finally win. We beat South Africa on the strength of Avi Gleek's goaltending and some offensive production from our usually dormant forwards. It feels so good to win, no matter who the opponent is.

Today is a low-key day because we are still recovering from New Year's and because we play Bulgaria tomorrow for fifth place.

We hung out a little with the Mexican and South African teams. They may not be great hockey players, but they're good guys and they speak English. So communication is possible.
Jan. 3: The only way to describe today's game is to call it a "whuppin." Our 7-3 win was our best team effort to date. We passed well, played good defence and generally outplayed our opponents on the final day of the tournament. Unfortunately, we have no more games left. The same results could have been achieved if we had practised together before the tournament, but we didn't have that luxury. Maybe Israel will learn for next time.

We stay to watch the gold medal game between Estonia and Lithuania. Estonia wins by six goals to take the gold. Yugoslavia beats Spain for the bronze. We are a better team than Spain, but our placement in the more difficult bracket means that we have to settle for fifth. We hoped to do a little better, but fifth place is not bad for our first time in this tournament.

The medals and MVP awards are handed out. For my five goals and five assists in four games I win the MVP award for Israel. The prize is an impressive wristwatch with the words "IIHF 1997 World Junior Championship Best Player Award" engraved on the back. It's something that I can show my grandkids one day to prove that I could once play hockey.

Some of the guys decide to go out at night to celebrate, but most of us, myself included, crash at about midnight.
Jan. 4: Today is departure day. Only the Canadians are leaving today. It takes a long time to say good-bye to our Israeli friends. We wish we could stay together, just not in Bulgaria. The next time we see them, Ran, David and Nadav will be wearing IDF uniforms. It's sad, but they say that all things must come to an end, so we content ourselves with taking a lot of pictures of each other. We (the Canadians) finally tear ourselves away and bus to the airport.

I'd call the airport a hole in the ground, but I don't want to give holes a bad reputation. It is an entirely vulgar and disgusting place with bare fluorescent lights and a layer of cigarette smoke that just sits in the air, covering everything with its smelly, cancer-producing film.

We fly to Frankfurt and check into our hotel there, which after the infamous Rodina seems like the Ritz-Carlton. It has heat and everything! We eat an overpriced meal at a nearby restaurant, return to our wonderful hotel, and crash into warm, comfortable beds for the first time in 10 days. We realize that what we've been missing are the small comforts afforded to us by Western civilization, like warm rooms or people who smile.
Jan. 5: We wake up feeling well rested for the first time all week. The beds are soft, the showers are hot, and best of all, there is a real, edible breakfast. There are eggs, cereals, breads, cheeses, butters, fruits, yogurts, coffee, juices and even cold milk.

We go to the airport and board the plane to begin our journey home. It was a good trip, but it never felt so good to come home to Canada.

War crimes case to proceed

Accused linked to atrocities

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The attempt to revoke the citizenship of alleged Nazi war criminal Peteris Vitols will go ahead, despite a request from the man's lawyer that the Justice minister withdraw the case.

John Sims, assistant deputy attorney general, said the request for a review by the man's lawyer is "a serious one" and he plans to discuss the matter with Justice Minister Allan Rock.

The lawyer, Donald Powell, is Vitols' son-in-law. Powell told The CJN the case against his father-in-law is flimsy and confused. He pointed to the legal documentation filed by government lawyers in December 1996 that he said backtracked from allegations made a year before.

The earlier notice to revoke Vitols' citizenship claimed he collaborated with Nazi forces and "participated in atrocities against the civilian population." The second notice, dated Dec. 18, 1996, claims Vitols was associated "with organizations engaged in atrocities against the civilian population."

"Their case was confused because they relied on KGB documents," Powell said.

The 1996 allegations state that Vitols misrepresented his wartime activities by concealing from "Canadian immigration and citizenship officials your collaboration with the occupying German authorities as a member of the Madona District Police in German occupied Latvia during the Second World War, your membership and service in the 281st Shutzmannshaft Battalion (Schuma 281) during that time, your membership and service in the Waffen SS during Conversion bill not yet settled: Bibi

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel will continue to recognize conversions by Conservative and Reform rabbis performed outside of Israel, but the government has not yet decided on the question of such conversions in Israel.

This was the message of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in a satellite TV broadcast to 55 Jewish communities in North America, including one in Toronto and one in Vancouver sponsored by their respective federations.

Netanyahu's speech was arranged by the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations in the United States, at which the prime minister will speak next month.

In reply to several questions about conversions, including one from Vancouver, Netanyahu said the status quo on conversions will not be changed, but that the courts "have thrown back to the Knesset" the question of such conversions taking place in Israel and this may not be decided for some time.

Netanyahu said he suspected that few people in North America are aware that it is the Reform movement that has asked the courts to rule for the first time on whether conversions carried out in Israel by C are legal.

This question is now being considered by his government and Netanyahu promised to listen to the concerns of the North American Jewish community, but he pointed out there would be no early decision on this "vexing problem."

Netanyahu said he knew the contentious subject would come up when he was forming a coalition government. "I said on this point

Rabbi Lau to Visit

WHISTLER, B.C. — Israel's Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Meir Lau and his wife will spend the last five days of Pesach at a Passover celebration in Whistler, a mountain resort 75 miles north of Vancouver.

The chief rabbi will be scholar in residence and will conduct classes, lectures and drashot during his visit.

One of the Vancouver guest speakers is David Radler, president of Hollinger International, which owns the Jerusalem Post.

ISRAEL

Reform Rabbis See PM

JERUSALEM – Fifty American Reform rabbis have voiced their "grave concerns" over Israel's pending conversion law in a meeting with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

During last week's meeting, the rabbis told the prime minister that the so-called "Rabbinical Court Conversion Bill" will delegitimize millions of non-Orthodox Jews in both Israel and the Diaspora.

If the bill passes in its current form, the Rabbinical Court will legally have sole jurisdiction over conversions performed in Israel.

Palestinian Talks

JERUSALEM – Netanyahu has appointed Foreign Minister David Levy to head Israel's negotiating team with the Palestinians.

Envoy Leaves Jordan

JERUSALEM —Prof. Shimon Shamir, Israel's ambassador to Jordan, has announced that he is leaving the post this month.

An embassy spokesperson denied rumors circulating in the Jordanian capital of Amman that Shamir's decision had anything to do with political differences between the ambassador and the current Israeli leadership.

WORLD

Sharansky In Moscow

MOSCOW – Former Soviet Jewish dissident Natan Sharansky returned to Moscow last week, two decades after he was arrested here by the KGB for his underground Zionist and human rights activities.

"I'm glad to be back in Moscow, the city which I was forced to leave 20 years ago," Sharansky said during a meeting with Moscow Mayor Yuri Luzhkov.

Prior to his arrest in 1977, Sharansky lived in downtown Moscow very close to the Moscow mayor's office. This time, he was received by the mayor as Israel's minister of industry and trade.

War Crimes Trial Ends

NEW YORK – A British jury has deemed that a man accused of being a former police commander in Nazi-occupied Byelorussia is unfit to appear before a court, collapsing the nation's first war crimes trial.

Szymon Serafinowicz, 86, has been accused of killing three Jews between 1941 and 1942 in Nazi-occupied Byelorussia, now Belarus.

Jewish School To Open

PRAGUE – When registration began earlier last month, nine students enrolled at the first Jewish day school to open in Prague since World War II.

The opening of the Ronald Lauder Basic School is indicative of the revival of Jewish life in Prague, a city whose vibrant Jewish community was all but annihilated during the war.

Aid to Rwanda

NEW YORK – Israel has sent a second plane of supplies to Rwanda for its refugee population.

The aid includes tons of various types of seeds, machines for producing bricks and roof shingles, and hundreds of hand tools, among other items.

Holocaust Commemorated

BONN – Dozens of commemoration ceremonies took place across Germany to mark the second national observance of Holocaust Day.

Last year, German President Roman Herzog called for the annual observance memorializing Holocaust victims to fall on Jan. 27, the date of the liberation of the Auschwitz death camp 52 years ago.

This year's commemorations included a main ceremony, attended by Herzog, held here before a joint session of both houses of Parliament.

Rothschild Appointed

NEW YORK – Kurt Rothschild, a prominent Canadian industrialist, was named to the national board of directors of the American Committee for Shaare Zedek Medical Center in Jerusalem.

A founder of the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation more than 25 years ago, Rothschild currently serves as the foundation's executive chair and is involved in a wide range of activities on behalf of the hospital in several Canadian communities.

BOURASSA URGED TO ENACT HUMAN RIGHTS CODE

Representatives of the Canadian Jewish Congress's eastern region urged Quebec Premier Robert Bourassa to legislate a human rights code to replace present statutes which are "fragmentary, incomplete and lacking in clarity," during a meeting held in Quebec City last week.

The committee asked the provincial leader to set up a human rights commission to assist victims of discrimination by using conciliatory and enforcement procedures. The meeting was the second of its kind in two years and was arranged as a special dialogue between Jewish community leaders and the Quebec premier.

UJA Federation reaches out to York Region

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish residents of York Region have a new avenue to access the organized Jewish community. UJA Federation has hired Saul Cohen, 24, as York Region outreach worker in a one-year seed project to address the needs of Canada's fastest-growing Jewish population.

Cohen's first project as outreach worker is a youth symposium scheduled for Feb. 23 at Westmount Collegiate in Thornhill.

The youth symposium, called Get YR'ed, will have a dual focus: to introduce teens to existing local services such as youth groups and to find out what services they feel are lacking. Until Cohen took on his new position last week, he was involved in the planning on a volunteer basis. The free symposium, which runs from 11:30 to 5, will include lunch and brainstorming sessions.

"We want to find out from the community what they want, as opposed to what we want to give them," said Cohen, who – at least for now – is housed with the rest of UJA Federation in the Lipa Green building, about five kilometres south of the southern boundary of York Region.

Eventually, he hopes to connect with all segments of the region's Jewish community. "The initial part of the job will be a a lot of investigative work," he said.

A recent biology graduate of the University of Guelph, where he served for a year as co-president of the Jewish Students' Organization, Cohen is a native of Johannesburg, South Africa. He was 15 years old when his family immigrated and settled in Thornhill. An alumnus of the Otzma program, on which he spent a year volunteering in Israel, he worked for UJA Federation as a summer student last year.

York region's Jewish population was 42,165 in 1991, according to Statistics Canada's most recent available census results. The area includes Thornhill, Richmond Hill, Aurora and Newmarket, as well as Whitchurch-Stouffville, King, East Gwillimbury and Georgina, all of which had Jewish populations of at least 75 when the census was taken.

According to a demographic study released last year, York Region has the third-largest Jewish population in the country after Toronto (125,000) and Montreal (100,000). The Jewish population has grown to an estimated 50,000, said Howard English, UJA Federation director of communications. The federation, however, has traditionally included the region as part of the 165,000 to 170,000-strong population of the Metro area.

The new outreach project was initiated and is funded by the federation's action committee for Jewish continuity, said Susan Jackson, director of continuity programming.

Notwithstanding the proliferation of synagogues and day schools in York Region and the opening of a local office of federation agency Jewish Family & Child Service a few years ago, the area is "organizationally underserviced" and includes "isolated pockets" of Jews, said English. "It's our mandate to build community and to reach out."

A local newsletter is expected to be published within the next few months, he added.

Disconnectedness, rather than assimilation, is the issue in York Region, according to Jackson. "They're not sure where to plug in."

CJC to examine anti-Semitic articles in Arab newspapers

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Immediate action is being taken to counteract anti-Semitic articles that have appeared in four Toronto Arab newspapers, the Ontario region executive of Canadian Jewish Congress was told recently.

The discussion followed up on a story in The Canadian Jewish News Jan. 16 revealing the existence of such reports.

"We will not tolerate anti-Semitic attacks," said Ellen Cole, the region's chair of community relations, reporting that a new subcommittee has been formed to meet with publishers of the Arab newspapers in question and with Arab community leaders.

"There are 350,000 Arabs and Muslims in Ontario and we need to take action before anything serious happens," said region executive member Dr. Naim Dallal.

He said the Arab newspapers are distributed free and can be picked up in any Arab store.

Cole said the Arab newspapers are not subject to regulations of the Ontario Press Council.

She said the committee will make advertisers in the newspapers aware of its concerns and also notify government leaders. The national office of the Canadian Jewish Congress has already been informed, she said.

A soaring moment of triumphant irony

There are certain moments in life that are so powerful, so poignant and so full of the soul-soaring, triumphant irony of human existence, that we must stop to notice them.

One such moment happened last week in Moscow, little noticed by the world, and even less understood.

Reporting in the Jerusalem Post, Abraham Rabinovich, filed the story which began thus: "Returning on Thursday to the notorious Lefortovo Prison where he had endured the most gruelling days of his life in freezing punishment cells, Industry and Trade Minister Natan Sharansky so savored the sense of victory, he was reluctant to leave."

Who among us who witnessed the event on television eleven years ago on Feb. 11, will ever forget the sight? Sharansky was crossing a West German bridge to freedom. Small, bowed slightly against the cold but postured perfectly toward his imminent destination, he wore an overcoat two or three sizes too big and a furry hat which slipped past his ears nearly to his chin. He jaunted rather than walked, deliberately zigging and zagging, a last defiant mischief aimed at his former jailers watching from the distance. His American escort, fully a foot taller, comfortable in his snugly-fitting overclothes, had difficulty keeping pace with him.

Eleven years after he stepped onto the bridge, he returned to the place of his imprisonment. This time he was a minister of Israel, the sovereign Jewish state to which he and his friends had so fervently yearned to immigrate but to which, for so long, their passage had been brutally stymied.

The day before he visited Lefortovo prison, he was received with fanfare and honors at city hall by Moscow's mayor, Yuri Luzhkov. Sharansky was in Moscow to promote industrial cooperation between Russia and Israel. Indeed he and his hosts did sign an agreement of intent during the visit.

At Lefortovo, he sought out the "punishment cell" to which prison officials had frequently consigned him.

Rabinovich reported on it. "Sharansky declined to leave [Lefortovo] until he was permitted to revisit one of the punishment cells. The prison director refused at first, saying punishment cells no longer existed.

"Finally, however, Sharansky was taken to one.

"It's even smaller than I remembered," he said.

"At his request, the prison authorities permitted him to remain in the cell for 10 minutes together with his wife, Avital.

"After the door closed on them, Avital sat on the solitary chair..."

In his autobiography, Fear No Evil, Sharansky described the cell and his experience in it. I reproduce an excerpt of that description to provide some sense of Sharansky's courage.

"The punishment cell was in the basement, where the darkness was broken only by a dull lamp over the door so the guard could see me through the peephole. The cement floor of my cell measured about two meters by one and a half. In the middle was a little cement stump that was almost too small to sit on. The walls were moist with large wet spots, and the damp plaster was peeling off. The moisture quickly penetrated through my clothing. At first I didn't feel the cold, but I could see that the night would be difficult.

"Of the 403 days I eventually spent in punishment cells, I had a padded jacket for no more than 15 or 20, although the temperature at night was almost always below 18 degrees. Anyone who tries to survive for a few days in a cold basement in thin clothing and with hot food on alternate days – not more than 1,500 calories – will know that even 18 degrees is no blessing."

The irony of his return to Russia, to Moscow, to Lefortovo, is too unsubtle a symbol for me to draw readers' attention to self-evident conclusions and obvious imagery. I prefer to conclude by referring, again, to Rabinovich's report.

"At an impromptu press conference atop a snowbank after emerging from the prison, Sharansky said the punishment cells had not only been a testing place but also a place where he had been able to do his clearest thinking.

"It is a place to think about good and evil, to think about real values," he said...

"Asked whether he had forgiven his captors, [Sharansky] said he had never seen his fight as a fight against individuals.

"There is no need to forgive those who lost," he said.

Many years ago, Alexander Lerner, a friend and fellow refusenik described Sharansky as "a hero of the Jewish emigration movement on such a scale as heroes in the Bible." How appropriate a description. MBD

Media focus on Canada

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada's woeful record in dealing with Nazi war criminals has caught the attention of the international media.

60 Minutes, CBS' flagship newsmagazine show, aired a documentary on the topic last week reviewing Canada's history of inaction.

Earlier, Dateline NBC aired a similar program and a few days before that, The CBC ran a piece that focused on alleged Nazi war criminal Helmut Oberlander. The Australian Broadcasting Corporation (ABC) also sent a crew to Canada to do a piece on Nazi war criminals, with Australian citizen Konrads Kalejs as its focus.

In addition, the Reuters news agency sent a reporter and photographer to Kalejs' immigration hearing.

Kalejs' story, and his decision to live in a North York condominium building in which several survivors reside, was profiled by the U.S. programs. In addition to interviewing several Jewish community spokesmen on the issue, the U.S. programs credited New York investigator Steven Rambam for exposing alleged Nazi collaborators living openly in Canada.

Political row in Thornhill predicted

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — The appointment of MPP Elinor Caplan as the Liberal candidate in Thornhill in the next federal election — bypassing the nomination process — would "fracture" the local Jewish community, asserts Liberal nomination hopeful Bernie Green.

Green, a three-term Vaughan city councillor who has sewn up support from major Jewish groups and synagogues in York Region, says Caplan's appointment would create "resentment" in Jewish circles.

Green told The CJN that he's worked hard during the nomination race to gain the Thornhill Jewish community's support, which would split should Caplan be parachuted into the riding.

"I've got nothing against Elinor. If she wants to enter the race, terrific, and the process should take its course. But if she's appointed, it would fracture the Jewish vote. It's not the wisest thing for the party to do," Green said.

It's been estimated that Thornhill riding will be 25 to 35 percent Jewish.

Green and others running for the Liberal nod in Thornhill are paying close attention to reports that Prime Minister Jean Chrétien is considering a plan to ensure that women comprise at least 25 percent of Liberal candidates in the next federal election. Caplan's name has been raised as a possibility in Thornhill, a riding that won't exist until the next federal vote.

Caplan, the MPP for Oriole, has said she's been contacted by the party and that she's seriously considering an offer in Thornhill [CJN, Jan. 30]. Asked last week whether that offer is an appointment or one to seek the nomination, she demurred: "I have had discussions with the federal campaign. No decision has been made, and that's all I can say right now."

Green conceded that the Liberal party is allowed to bypass nominations and appoint candidates, "but only under appropriate conditions, and these are not appropriate conditions. I'm certainly a reasonable candidate."

Green's campaign manager, Howard Shore, said Green will make his concerns known to the party, but there's little more that can be done.

"We've made our position clear. But we're team players, and there will be no official protest.

"It wouldn't speak well of [Caplan] if she accepted an appointment," Shore said, adding that basing an appointment on gender and a riding's demographics is "insulting."

No date for the nomination meeting has been set yet.

The CJN's calls to David Smith, the Liberals' national campaign co-chair, were not returned.

Fromm hires Christie to fight dismissal

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Controversial teacher Paul Fromm is contesting the recommendation of the Peel Board of Education to terminate his employment — and he's retained Victoria lawyer Doug Christie to do it.

Christie represented Fromm at a hearing last week before a committee of the Peel board of trustees, where he argued against the termination. The hearing will continue in mid-February.

Fromm's latest imbroglio resulted from a complaint to the board by B'nai Brith Canada (BBC), which argued that Fromm had violated the board's 1993 order he not associate with right-wing extremists. BBC alleged that in 1994 Fromm spoke at a memorial gathering for Revilio Oliver, a longtime proponent of anti-Semitism and that in April 1996 he spoke at a Vancouver conference organized by extremists.

Should the trustees' committee uphold the board's recommendation to terminate Fromm's employment, he is entitled, under terms of the teachers' collective bargaining agreement, to file a grievance against the decision. He is also entitled to representation by counsel from the Ontario Secondary Schools Teachers Federation. "The federation has the legal obligation to represent its members in a fair manner and if it refuses to provide representation and access to arbitration, it can be sued by the member for failure to represent him," the lawyer for the federation said.

"Whether we think Fromm will win or not is not the issue. The federation has the legal obligation under the collective agreement to provide its member teachers access to the arbitration process," the lawyer said.

The Fromm case includes issues that could apply to other teachers who are not involved in conduct similar to Fromm's, such as the extent of control a school board can have over a teacher's out of school activities, he added.

The lawyer pointed out the federation was not involved in Fromm's appearance before the trustees' committee or in subsidizing Fromm's decision to retain Christie.

Jewish law students gather in Toronto

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The recent 10th annual conference of the Canadian Jewish Law Students Association (CJLSA) — Canada's only functioning national Jewish student organization — was a resounding success, with 158 participants representing campuses from Vancouver to Halifax.

The weekend conference, held at the Sheraton Centre Hotel, was co-sponsored by B'nai Brith Canada; Hillel, the Foundation for Jewish Campus Life; and Osgoode Hall Jewish Students Association. It afforded students a chance to meet with peers and hear a distinguished group of guests, most of whom stayed on for discussion after their presentations.

Speakers included Justice Claire L'Heureux-Dubé on Equality Issues and Minority Rights; Agi Meinhard, Bert Raphael and Marvin Kurz on Volunteerism and Activism in the Jewish Community; Lorraine Weinrib and Tsvi Kahana on Trends in Constitutionalism in Canada and Israel; Kathleen Mahoney and Alan Borovoy on Human Rights and Civil Liberties; Edward Greenspan on Current Issues in Criminal Law; and judges Michael Moldaver, John I. Laskin and Kathryn Feldman on Reflections from the Bench.

Irving Abella (father of convention co-chair and incoming CJLSA president Jacob Abella of the University of Toronto) held an "informal shmooze."

"I loved the conference," said Tamara Howarth, a third-year law student at the University of British Columbia (UBC). "I think it's important for us to keep in touch with the [rest of the Canadian] community." It's easy to see the Rockies as a barrier, she noted.

The nine-person 1997-98 CJLSA executive, acclaimed at the conference, includes three regional vice-presidents: Ted Shoub of UBC, vice-president, West; Aliza Karoly of Osgoode Hall, vice-president, Central (the area from Windsor to Ottawa); and Ariel Deckelbaum of McGill University, vice-president, East. Jacob Abella succeeds Ari Kaplan of Osgoode Hall as president.

Although the annual conference has traditionally been CJLSA's main focus, Abella would like to see the organization "take on the odd cause or two in conjunction with Jewish organizations."

For Abella, the main message of this year's conference was "wherever there's intolerance or inequality, to respect our Jewish roots and go out and make a difference. We have obligations to the community at large and, most importantly, we can't forget who we are." The theme of the conference was the biblical injunction Tzedek, Tzedek Tirdof (Justice You Shall Pursue).

A common thread linking the various programs was "not just law for the sake of law, but how the law impacts on society," said Howarth.

In the session on volunteerism, Meinhard, a business professor at Ryerson Polytechnic University, urged students to address the volunteer sector "crisis" and "reinforce our Jewish tradition" by volunteering as professionals. Naamat Canada, with which Meinhard is affiliated, runs a legal counselling service for women, for which 35 lawyers volunteer time.

Jonathan Zepp, a third-year student at the University of Ottawa, has often thought of becoming involved in community work, but never in a professional capacity. The conference opened his eyes to new possibilities. "It's something I could see myself participating in."

The conference "really put a face to the law," said first-year student Sharon Strosberg of the University of Windsor. "We spend a lot of time reading words on pages. When we got to see judges and hear them answering our questions, it was a great experience."

Kalejs' counsel attack witness, 'Soviet' evidence

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Counsel for Konrads Kalejs last week launched a multi-pronged defence of their client, attacking the evidence of an expert historian and suggesting Latvian-based witnesses and documents were unreliable because they originated in the former Soviet Union.

Immigration consultant Win Thompson said historian Konrad Kwiet stretched credulity when he testified that Arajs Kommando (AK) killers lived normal lives after committing bloody atrocities.

"I find it extremely difficult to believe that people could go out, commit horrible war crimes and come back and live a normal life," he said. "I don't believe they could come home to a wife...after killing at a killing pit."

Thompson's suggestion prompted a series of questions by Immigration adjudicator Anthony Iozzo, who pointed to instances when the neighbors of common killers express surprise that the mild-mannered person they knew could have committed awful crimes.

That is different from a situation in which a group of men commit mass murder, Thompson responded.

"You're not suggesting we should be able to identify a murderer or a war criminal just by looking at him?" Iozzo asked.

Thompson persisted in his view, saying "To go out and kill, come home and eat a meal with their family...I find that very difficult to believe."

Thompson's line of argument came as the marathon case neared its end. The week before, government lawyers concluded their arguments. A further three days of tribunal time was set aside for this week to conclude all legal submissions, after which Iozzo will consider his decision.

Government authorities are seeking to deport Kalejs, an Australian citizen living in Toronto, for failing to disclose his alleged involvement in war crimes and because, they say, he is not a genuine visitor to Canada. While the government contends that Kalejs, who lives in a North York condo, does not intend to leave the country after his visit, the bulk of their case focused on his involvement in war crimes as a member of Latvia's Arajs Kommando auxiliary police unit.

Lawyers Donald MacIntosh and Bonnie Boucher presented five wartime documents that identify Kalejs as a member of the police detachment as well as videotaped testimony of former AK men who identified Kalejs as a senior lieutenant in the unit. Their first witness, however, was Kwiet, who presented an overview of events in wartime Latvia and testified to the authenticity of AK documents, based on his experience viewing similar material.

Kalejs' counsel attacked the authenticity of four of the documents while arguing a fifth document was prepared for Kalejs to attest to his membership in the unit — even though Kalejs never actually served there. Kalejs told the hearing that in 1941 he asked a friend to falsify the document so that he could submit it to the University of Riga to smooth his admission.

Kwiet had testified that such documents and the official German stamps that sealed them were tightly controlled and so it was unlikely they could be misused. But Thompson argued that Kwiet did not substantiate his claim that documents were closely guarded or that improper use of such materials could lead to drastic repercussions from the Nazis.

"We've had no evidence to back that up, no records, no proof," he said.

Turning to another of the wartime AK documents, a November 1942 certificate attesting to Kalejs' membership in the unit, Thompson said "the certificate form could be quite genuine but the content fraudulent."

Thompson also questioned a third AK document that was also submitted to the University of Riga. That certificate was signed by an AK doctor and attested to Kalejs' good health. That document bears no letterhead and is undated. "I don't believe the document is legitimate," Thompson said.

Thompson also took issue with evidence that stated Jews at the Salaspils concentration camp outside Riga suffered high mortality rates due to lack of food. "Many died but to say they got little food is bordering on speculation," he said.

Earlier, Kalejs' other counsel, Lloyd MacIlquham, launched a blanket attack on the videotape evidence presented at the hearing. (The U.S. Office of Special Investigation videotaped the testimony of former AK men in Latvia and used it in Kalejs' American proceedings, after which he moved to Canada. Those tapes were obtained by Canadian authorities and were used as evidence at Kalejs' Toronto hearing, despite objections by Kalejs' counsel.)

Little weight should be given to that evidence because counsel in Toronto were not able to cross-examine the witnesses, MacIlquham argued. Acknowledging that Kalejs' U.S. lawyer did question all the witnesses in Latvia, MacIlquham said the issues raised in the U.S. case are different than those in Canada and so the questions asked would be different.

MacIlquham's argument prompted Iozzo to say he was troubled by the lack of specific examples. "We're still dealing with very general and to some extent, very vague terms...Are you asking me to discount completely the evidence from Riga because it was a Soviet republic?"

"We ask that it be given zero weight...[because] we weren't given the opportunity to cross-examine," MacIlquham said.

Turning to the witnesses themselves, MacIlquham said several factors must be considered when evaluating their evidence: they had been questioned by Soviet authorities prior to testifying on tape; they were under the direct control of the Soviets; and they had themselves been jailed for involvement in war crimes.

Dangerous stress

Since January last year, 31 Israeli soldiers have been killed in south Lebanon. Included in that list, tragically, are the three young men who lost their lives last week in a roadside explosion caused by Hezbollah. The adjective "young" is not used generically, but specifically. Yonatan Tsirkel, the commander of the group, was 21. Rotem Sharvit and Niv Sadan were 19. It is indeed true to say that Israel's defence rests primarily on the shoulders of its children.

Though the base of operations is south Lebanon, it is Iran, not the Lebanese, waging religious, fundamentalist, fanatic war against the Jewish state. Hezbollah is made up of Iranian surrogates, trained, funded, supported, inspired and directed by the mullahs and ayatollahs in Tehran. The integrity of the border between Israel and Lebanon is not the cause of their fighting; it is merely an inconvenience.

And because Lebanon is now nothing more than a Syrian satrapy, Syria watches comfortably from the sidelines as Iran visits its purposeful and violent death upon Israeli and south Lebanese soldiers.

The arrangement between the two countries is quite convenient. Iran props up Syria's economy to a significant degree, as well as Syria's historic, strategic adversariality to Iraq. Syria, on the other hand, facilitates Hezbollah's [read Iran's] campaign against Israel and is Iran's main Arab interlocutor in the mostly Arab Muslim Middle East. But since tyrants foster no loyalties other than to self, the Iranian-Syrian "arrangement" will inevitably founder on the rocks of deceit and self-interest, two of tyranny's chief hallmarks.

Earlier in the week, before the bombing took place, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu announced that a triumvirate of ministers, Dan Meridor, David Levy and Yitzhak Mordechai, would be directly involved in any negotiations with the Syrians, if and when negotiations started. But after the killings, negotiations with Syria seemed to be a less imminent possibility. Many Israelis applauded and accepted the view of President Ezer Weizman who said: "Given the situation in Lebanon, it is impossible to hold negotiations with Syria. Something must be done to change the situation."

It should not be left up to Israel alone to "change the situation." Western countries, including Canada, who are attempting to nurture the peace process, and who never hesitate to criticize and even condemn Israel for its policies, must publicly and unambiguously express outrage against the surrogates, their supporters and their facilitators.

Not to do so is to lay bare their hypocrisy toward Israel and, far worse, to expose the peace process to dangerous stress.

Heartless policy

The Office de la langue française in Quebec now has a new assignment. The Parti Québécois (PQ) council last week voted unanimously (our emphasis) to have the Office review the circumstances under which health services need to be provided in the English language. It is a heartless, vindictive policy that underlies the request by the PQ, unnecessarily preying upon and sharpening the fears of the anglophone minority, especially the elderly and the frail.

Last March, Premier Lucien Bouchard assured the English-speaking community: "When you go to a hospital and you're in pain, you may need a blood test, but you certainly don't need a language test." That may now change. The language test may indeed precede the blood test.

No assurance is better than a false one.

THE FIRST ZIONIST CONFERENCE, BASEL 1897

"From times immemorial, the world has been misinformed about us. The sentiment...with which we have been reproached so frequently and so acrimoniously was in process of disintegration when we were attacked by anti-Semitism And anti-Semitism served to strengthen it anew."

Pollards reiterate their position

Re: Clarification in CJN, Jan. 23:

Jonathan and I would like to reiterate the statement that Jonathan made in our original press release. We are aware that prison officials Joe Meko (assistant warden) and Frank Collinsworth (unit manager) were contacted by Ha'aretz and by the Toronto Star, and in both cases, they refused to be interviewed and they did not breach public trust by disclosing information of a personal nature to any journalist.

No genetic basis for Jewishness

Re: CJN's Jan. 9 article on genetic links in kohanim: Perhaps the most useful analogy is that of an archeological discovery, which confirms a long-standing biblical and oral religious tradition. Instead of digging into the earth, we explored the human genome, and discovered remnants of the past that were preserved in common among modern day kohanim. It is the confirmation of this ancient oral tradition which is uplifting in terms of unifying the world Jewish community. It is important to note, that we did not discover a gene per se. Rather, the finding is a Y-chromosome DNA "fingerprint" that is more common in kohanim (even of different geographic origins), compared to Israelite controls.

Our work is also entirely consistent with the halachic definition of Jewishness based upon maternity. It appears that the sages were prescient, and in their great wisdom, defined criteria for Jewishness, which preclude any possibility of establishing a "genetic" basis for "Jewishness."

It is the strongly held view of the authors that persons should be valued on their individual merits, and not on the basis of their genealogy or ancestry.

Rauca's role in Lithuanian ghetto slaughter

Re: Irving Abella's letter (CJN, Jan. 23). There are three incorrect statements.

Rauca was a Gestapo official in Kaunas who had been in charge of Jewish affairs. In reality, one cannot say that he was "involved." Rauca was the administrator of this event. Rauca himself ordered all the Jews in Kaunas ghetto to assemble on a square on Oct. 28, 1941. Rauca himself selected who should live and who should die. Altogether that day, 9,200 (not over 11,000) Jews from Kaunas ghetto were chosen to die. They were rounded up by a Lithuanian police unit and the next day murdered by the same Lithuanian police unit at the Ninth Fort. This event is still called the "Big Action."

Kaunas is not a "small city." It was the capital of pre-war Lithuania. There was a Jewish community of 35,000, one of the oldest in the Baltic states. The "Big Action" is the most tragic event in the history of the Holocaust in Lithuania (Kaunas). Every year all over the world, surviving Lithuanian Jews commemorate those slain on Oct. 28 and 29, 1941, and SS Master Sergeant (Hauptsturmfuhrer) Helmut Rauca played the most important role.

I was selected by Rauca to live. I participated in the resistance movement and was a partisan not far from Kaunas. In 1982, I immigrated to Canada and for more than 10 years I taught at York University in the departments of Social and Political Science.

Listen to Jewish voices on Genesis

Given that The CJN is a newspaper for a Jewish audience, I find it fascinating that Bernard Baskin's article (CJN, Jan. 23) on reading materials on Genesis focused on Bill Moyers' TV series and Karen Armstrong's book, given the glut of material on the market written by Jewish authors and rabbis. He acknowledges the range of Jewish and non-Jewish perspectives in the former. Armstrong's Catholic perspective in the latter leaves me personally feeling a large gap between her point of view and solid Jewish interpretation.

Let's acknowledge those in our own community and hear our own voices!

Canadians in Israel

For a book I am planning to write on Canadians in Israel, including those who arrived before Statehood, I would like to receive on loan (to be returned) memoirs, anecdotes, personal and families' sagas, experiences of early klita, successes, hardships, failures, and recollections of those who returned. Also conditions that inspired Aliyah, and conditions of life in then Palestine/Israel. Loaned photos will be returned.

Czech community threatened with extinction

By YAACOV GLICKMAN

In the summer of 1995, I visited Prague and the outlying regions of the Czech Republic as part of a larger project on the "survival chances" of worldwide Jewish communities in the post-world war era. Based on archival materials and a number of interviews with key leaders of the Prague Jewish community, the visit generated preliminary observations on the topic, with further information gathering and analysis of the subject matter still to come.

The study was inspired by Bernard Wasserstein's 1996 thesis on The Vanishing European Diaspora Since 1945. In it, Wasserstein explains the shifting centrality of Diaspora Jewish life from Europe to America as a result of the triple force of the Holocaust, assimilation and out-migration that have brought European Jewry to the verge of extinction with almost "nothing left save a disembodied memory." He goes on to observe that by the late 1980s both the Czech Republic and Slovakia (separated since 1993) "had become for Jews not much more than a graveyard."

A significant portion of the data I examined confirmed Wasserstein's thesis. Prior to World War II, Czechoslovak Jewry is reported by Wasserstein to have numbered 357,000 persons, forming 2.4 percent of the country's total population. Following the war, only 55,000 survived, a casualty rate amounting to 93 percent of the prewar Jewish population (surpassed only by the losses suffered by the Jews of Poland). Subsequent to waves of out-migration to Israel and North America, this figure was further reduced to 7,600 persons, a minuscule 2.1 percent of the pre-war Jewish population, who were still living in that area in 1994.

Contrary to the frequently used "sheep to the slaughter" analogy (alleging to the passive way at which Jews acquiesced to their extermination by the Nazis), Czechoslovak Jews fought with the Allied Forces on all the war fronts and were most prominent in the 1944 Slovak anti-Nazi uprising where they suffered heavy casualties. This had further reduced an already decimated population into a mere shadow of its pre-war strength and vitality.

This shadow of a vibrant past has perished with hardly an appreciable change into the present historical moment. The community leaders with whom I spoke estimated the number of "registered" Jews living currently in the Czech Republic at 3,000 only, of whom 1,400 in all are said to reside in Prague.

The evidence points rather unequivocally to a profile hardly conducive to great "survival chances" of the community in question, judging by demography alone. I judge the faint hope for some revival expressed by the community leaders, in light of a recent increase of mostly elderly returnees from the West and some expectations for increased immigration from the East, as unlikely to seriously affect anytime soon the overall demographic attrition reported at the present juncture. The community leaders with whom I talked seemed to have acknowledged this gloomy forecast, their expressed hopes notwithstanding.

Demographics are only the raw materials that energize peoples' activities within the organizational framework in which they live. In addition to demographic growth, there are two prerequisites for the survival of sociocultural communities: the first is the support by the community's rank-and-file, of its cultural and value premises. The second is the provision by the community to its members of essential services such as education, resettlement of immigrants, health and welfare, and tools for religious expression.

On this basis, the Czech Jewish community barely meets the minimum standards for long-term survival, despite valiant attempts made by the leaders in charge to turn the tide in a more favorable direction.

These shortcomings are illustrated in the community's 'global-shaped' age distribution. Normal age distribution usually takes on the shape of a pyramid, allowing the young to concentrate in the wide bottom thus forming the reservoir for the future, the elderly at the narrow top, with the middle-aged category large enough at the pyramid's midpoint allowing for a young and vibrant population to renew itself.

The author and Vaclav Havel

The people with whom I spoke estimated the community's age distribution at 70 percent aged 60 and over, 20 percent aged 25 and under, and, at the goblet's narrow waist, only 10 percent middle-aged. On balance, this age profile indicates a progressively aging population causing severe shortage in peak reproduction and work maturation. Most elderly people, I was told, are government pensioners whose meagre income is partially supplemented by the community, mostly through support for accommodation and in the form of social programs and cash benefits, depending on income and family status. These forms of support must be siphoned out of limited community coffers already strained to their core essentials, at the very best.

Other factors chipping away at the community's future survival include widespread intermarriage, estimated at a staggering 90 percent, compared to a pre-World War II ratio of 48 percent, waves of out-migration in 1948, following the communist takeover, in 1952 following the Slansky trials, and in 1968, following the Russian occupation of Czechoslovakia, and the community's weak organizational structure .

Side by side with pronounced anti-Semitism, modern Czechoslovakia has been inspired, under the leadership of luminaries such as Thomas and Jan Masaryk and Edward Benes, by a strong liberal impulse, respect for democratic principles and tolerance for differing lifestyles and political philosophies. Currently, President Vaclav Havel is a towering philosopher-statesman (actually he is a playwright and a poet) who has brought — not without difficulties — into public life, respect for individual freedoms so embedded at least in part in Czech tradition. And as in many countries where Jews were freed from the bondage of civic restrictions, such enlightened forces accelerated Jewish integration and assimilation into mainstream Czechoslovak society.

The Encyclopedia Judaica reports that already in 1930, only about 57 percent of Czechoslovak Jews (defined by religion) declared their nationality as Jewish. The rest declared their nationality as either Czechoslovak or German. At the time that survey was conducted, only 27 percent of the Jews of Prague considered themselves Jewish by the same yardstick.

A similar profile unfolds with regard to education and community organization. In education, not even the bare minimum was provided as late as five years ago. The people whom I interviewed reported some progress in the teaching of Hebrew, lectures for adults about Israel run by the community rabbi, and some supplementary Talmud Torah classes up to the third grade for the young. All they could hope for was a full kindergarten and a two-class elementary program targeted for the year 2000.

The Jewish federation based in Prague is an umbrella organization administering the locally organized Jewish population presently concentrated in 10 cities across the Czech Republic, of which Prague, Brno, Ostrava, Pilzen, and Carlovy Vary — formerly Carlsbad — are the largest ones.

The Prague Jewish community is the official representative of the countrywide Jewish population vis-a-vis the Czech government, the government of the State of Israel, and the worldwide Jewish community. The Czech Jewish community is officially a member of the World Jewish Congress, the American Jewish Congress and the European Council of Jewish communities, and is registered as a district ethnocultural community with the Czech Ministry of Culture.

Presently, most community functions are performed by the office of the rabbi, the community's social, cultural, economic, and educational sections (departments) and the secretariat, in charge of day-to-day administration and technical upkeep.

The community's upper echelons where most power and influence are concentrated consist of an elected president (a position occupied at the time the interviews took place by the late Zeno Dostal, film director, scholar and writer), an appointed executive director (Dr. Tomas Kraus, linguist, jurist, and art organizer), the rabbi (Czech educated Rabbi Karel Ephraim Sidor), and 28 elected (predominantly male) board members of whom no more than eight individuals actively partake in the decision-making process.

Cultural and especially literary output has been the sole area where the pace of Jewish creativity has been developing largely unhindered, despite the sharp swings between the peaks and nadirs of Jewish life and frequent impediments mounted by both Czechoslovak officialdom and large sections of the Czechoslovak population.

By historical circumstance and because of the country's ethnic and religious heterogeneity (German, Czechoslovak, Hungarian and Carpatho-Russian), Czechoslovak Jews have produced literary giants such as Franz Kafka, Max Brod (chronicler of Kafka's life and work), Franz Werfel (who wrote about the Turkish massacre of the Armenians), and more recently Frantisek Langer (the greatest Czech playwright after Karel Capek), Eduard Goldstuecker (a literary historian), and Arnost Lustig and Jiri weil (both of whom wrote about the plight of Jews during the Nazi occupation of Czechoslovakia), to cite just a few examples. This is a contribution out of all proportion to the small minority of Jews in the country's population as a whole.

Jews have also been prominent, all the way down to the present, in mainstream Czechoslovak politics and public affairs (the current parliamentary president and minister of culture are both Jewish, though apparently of the "non-Jewish" Jewish variety). And the millions of tourists who flock annually to visit Prague's Jewish district with its magnificent synagogues, museums, and art treasures, are testimonies to a glorious past still lingering in the hearts and minds of Czechoslovak Jews.

This glory notwithstanding, it can hardly be expected, in and of itself, to turn the tide of diminution and decline of a community so proud during the pre-war years of its viability and durability.

Why, then, study a community in the throes of extinction?

Because for one thing, the die has yet not been conclusively cast, and because throughout history Jews have been known to have endured successive waves of decimation and assimilation and to have still come around to fight another day. For another, there are lessons to be drawn from this saga by Jewish communities in different parts of the world who may still turn the tide of extinction as they try to promote their own survival.

This is after all what the study of history is all about.

Halifax deals with disturbing news

January 1997 will, for a long time, be remembered as that month when the Halifax Jewish community made headline news. Unfortunately, it was bad news.

By Viva Press in Halifax

Stuart Friedman, the cantor at Halifax's Orthodox Beth Israel Synagogue, was convicted and sent back to the United States for possessing and distributing child-pornography.

The conviction sent waves of disbelief throughout the Jewish community. Besides having to deal with the problems this event posed to Jewish communities as a whole, the Halifax Jewish community had to face the media frenzy that comes with such a situation. This was, after all, one of the biggest stories to hit Halifax in a long time.

This scandal was the lead story on television news for four days.

It was also front page news in the papers for a number of days. And commentaries on this crisis continued to be in the papers all through January.

One of the things that disturbed me was the way in which the news media referred to the synagogue. It was identified as a Jewish church.

I was watching the local ATV news when the story broke. The anchor introduced the story and said that Friedman was a cleric at the Beth Israel Jewish Church. This made me cringe. How could someone call the synagogue a church?

I immediately telephoned the newsroom. The news editor to whom I spoke asked me how I would describe a synagogue. I told him that people probably know what a synagogue is, but if they didn't know, then it could be described as a Jewish place of worship.

Within an hour, the news station had received more than 30 calls correcting their misnomer. When a friend of mine called the news editor, he sighed before thanking her for calling then added that she was one of many who had called in.

My question is, why did people have to call in? Shouldn't a well-known news station know that a synagogue is not a Jewish church? The mere wording of Jewish church is a paradox. The papers and radio stations also made this error.

I am left feeling confused. Did this misnomer occur to facilitate an understanding of what a synagogue is or did the researchers think it wasn't a significant distinction?

I was also asked many questions by my friends on how I felt about this whole issue. Was I shocked? Did I know the cantor? Did I agree with the sentence he was given?

Yes, I was shocked. Yes, I knew the cantor. Yes, I agree with his sentence.

Friedman came across as a pleasant man. He was very quiet and kept to himself. I had met him a few times, but had never really had an in depth conversation with him. His crime really came as a shock to me.

My first reaction was "Oh no, how could this happen?" Then, I thought of the effects this incident would have on the Halifax Jewish community and on the global Jewish community as a whole.

The Jewish communities worldwide are, despite inter-religious controversies, very tight-knit. Any time something unsavory happens in one community, all communities feel the impact.

Because Jews are often seen in a negative light, because we are often accused and slandered by outsiders, we have learned through history to stick together, to work as a community to dispel common misconceptions about who we are.

So, when a crime of this magnitude occurs in our community, the outside world loses no time in casting aspersions on the entire Jewish community. On the Jewish communities worldwide. Picking us apart.

There was a mad rush within the media to get the scoop. Members of the Jewish community were hounded down to comment on Friedman's obsession with child pornography. The community became the focus for media attention.

And this is why I agree with Friedman's sentence. Friedman was fined $2,000, he had to give his two computers to the police and he had to leave the country immediately. Friedman's leaving the local community is the best thing that came out of this case. Rather than have him stay in this community and encourage more press coverage, the culprit was gone.

I felt torn between two worlds. I wanted the Halifax Jewish community to have its privacy. But, I'm also a journalist. I know that if I were assigned to cover such a story, I too would have been one of people those asking the questions.

The Halifax Jewish community began picking up the pieces. The community, as a community, is still dealing with the fallout of this disturbing incident. The Halifax community is still in the process of self-examination and of healing.

Politics is a fascinating field

Since I am a political science student at McGill University, people assume that I am fascinated with politics. In Canada, however, a fascination for politics is something that is hard to come by. Not to be condescending to my home and native land, but the fact of the matter is that issues like the fisheries, the budget and even national unity seem quite secondary in the big picture. The positive side, however, is that Canada is an established country; we have already laid down the fundamental principles on which Canadian society is based. Although this doesn't do much to ease the "pain" of a Canadian political scientist, it says a lot about the progress the country has made since its establishment.

By Justin Korda in Montreal

Israel, a country entering its 49th year of existence, witnesses tremendous political tension with each decision, for underlying each decision is a debate regarding the basic principles on which the society should be based, as well as important issues of national security. The 120 members in the Knesset are representative of virtually every possible position on the political spectrum.

The past month in Israel has really been a "treat" for political scientists. As the long negotiation process on the status of Hebron finally came to end on Jan. 15, political rhetoric was uttered by all sides.

The politically loaded language that was thrown at Benjamin Netanyahu ultimately exemplified why Israeli politics is such a tense business. The left wing attempted to take credit for the agreement, sarcastically congratulating the prime minister on realizing that Shimon Peres and Yitzhak Rabin were right all along. Many in the right wing tried to distance themselves from Netanyahu, labelling him as a sly politician who abandoned his electorate.

For anyone who has actually made the effort to examine the Hebron agreement carefully, it is evident that the seven-month negotiating process produced a number of changes to the original redeployment envisioned by Rabin and Peres in the principles of the Interim Agreement.

Netanyahu undeniably took his time to negotiate this agreement, but he also took extreme caution. Paying close attention to details, it appears he has attempted to ensure the safest arrangement in terms of security. Some of these details include the presence of the Israeli Defence Forces in joint patrols overlooking the Jewish area, the creation of buffer zones in areas of Jewish settlement where no weapons can be admitted, the freedom of action by the IDF in all areas of Hebron to defend Israelis, the restriction of Palestinian construction in areas adjacent to the Jewish presence and along major arteries, permanent joint mobile patrols taking place in the Palestinian controlled area, improvement of the main fairway, the Shuhada road, in order to improve security conditions, and a promise to "preserve and consolidate" the Jewish community in Hebron. While Netanyahu agreed to set the dates for further Israeli redeployment, he also received a pledge from Arafat to finally ammend the Palestinian covenant, as promised to his predecessors.

Netanyahu was elected in a campaign in which he promised to continue the peace process as it is stipulated in the Oslo agreements and that is precisely the framework he followed. The prime minister has continued to support and encourage the Jewish community of Hebron. The status of Hebron as a result of Netanyahu's agreement is very complicated.

Calling Netanyahu a prime minister who has "abandoned his electorate," "a traitor to Zionsim" and a "liar" for signing the very agreement that he criticized his predecessors for drafting is far from the truth.

This type of mud-slinging is characteristic of Israeli politics. But is it always something to complain about? In addition to providing some powerful expressions of strong convictions, it also gives the person interested in political science something to thrive on.

Return to Poland

Back in 1966, when Leonid Brezhnev and his Communist regime were still in power, I paid my only visit to Poland and its diminutive Jewish community. It was deeply depressing and, at the time, the future seemed very dim indeed. But the Communists are gone now, Poland has chosen a new road and Jews appear to be coming back to live there.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Someone sent me the off-print of an article that deals with that subject published in New York's The Village Voice (Sept. 10, 1996). The author of the article is Vince Beisel, and he took a look at a phenomenon that he judged truly extraordinary: "Poland is amongst the most anti-Semitic nations on earth. But it is also the site of a miraculous Jewish renewal."

The new Jewish culture in today's Poland, he says, is "spawned by Spielberg's make-believe Holocaust — simulated Jewish life in a place of overwhelming Jewish death." Beisel quotes one of the local observers to say that in the face of great difficulties, Jews are producing a nascent culture that stands in odd contrast both to the past and to the Polish present.

Experts disagree on the number of Jews presently in the country. Official statistics speak of a few thousand only — mostly elderly Holocaust survivors — but activists in the community estimate the real numbers to be anywhere from 10,000 to 80,000.

In this count, who is considered a Jew? Says Beisel: "Most of them fit the 20th century de facto definition of a Jew; they have at least one Jewish grandparent. That made you a Jew for Hitler, it makes you a Jew in Israel, and it makes you a Jew in Poland's new community." (The definition is of course de facto and in no way halachic.)

Beisel offers statistics about continuing anti-Semitism in the country and quotes a study by the American Jewish Committee, which found 30 percent of those polled did not want Jewish neighbors; 36 percent believed that Jews killed Jesus; and 35 percent think it is "good" that there are now many fewer Jews in Poland than before the war. "A favorite smear in post-Communist elections has been to accuse one's opponents of having Jewish blood. Lech Walesa pioneered the tactic in 1990 when he accused two rivals of 'hiding their Jewish origins,' unlike him, 'a full-blooded Pole.' "

On the other hand there is also a significant revival of gentile interest in what happened to the Jews and what kind of rich culture was theirs in the olden days. They point to the fact that the charge of Polish anti-Semitism reflects only a part of the country's relationship with Jews. All of this brings the author to his crucial question: Why do our people return there?

For anyone who has studied Jewish history and its demographic shifts, the answer is not hard to find: New generations breed both forgetfulness and hope in a better future. People go where they can make a living and they argue that the past cannot rule their future. In a way the revival of Jewish life in Poland, such as it is, parallels a similar development in Germany.

The Kirshner File

Russia vulnerable to right-wing extremism

"Are there any Jews in your party?" Aurel Braun asked Vladimir Zhirinovsky.

By Sheldon Kirshner

Braun, a University of Toronto political scientist, was in Russia when he put that question to Zhirinovsky, the reportedly half-Jewish, ultra-nationalist, anti-Semitic, rabble-rousing leader of the misnamed Liberal Democratic party.

Braun's encounter with Zhirinovsky took place three years ago, when he was in Moscow to compile research for a book on right-wing extremism initiated by B'nai Brith Canada.

And he hasn't forgotten Zhirinovsky's revealing response. "He looked me straight in the face and said, without blinking, 'Maybe one.'"

Was Zhirinovsky, who normally denies being of Jewish ancestry, referring facetiously to himself?

To Braun, co-author of The Extreme Right (Westview Press), the answer is almost beside the point. Regardless of Zhirinovsky's ethnic affiliation, he remains a potential threat to Russian democracy, Braun said in an interview.

Braun, who wrote the recently published book with Concordia University history professor Stephen Scheinberg, contends that radical right-wing parties in established Western democracies do not stand much of a chance of gaining power.

But in emerging democratic countries like Russia, "the danger is graver" and the "opportunities for extremism exist," notes Braun, a 49-year-old specialist in international relations who emigrated from Romania with his family in 1961.

In his view, Zhirinovsky's chances of succeeding President Boris Yeltsin are exceedingly slim. Still, Zhirinovsky is a major force. The real danger, Braun says, comes from supposedly respectable Russian politicians who basically share his chauvinistic ideas.

Anti-Semitism, he believes, is widespread throughout the extreme right in Europe. "In spite of the very small number of Jews in many European countries, the popular condemnation of anti-Semitism, the political disadvantages of such prejudice and the availability of other victims, strong anti-Semitic currents constantly materialize on the extreme right," he observes.

According to Braun, anti-Semitism is useful to these elements for three reasons. It is critical for indoctrinating new recruits, furthering internal solidarity and conferring continuity from the past.

"For right-wing extremists, Jews represent the unidentified enemy behind the state, behind politicians, behind any position of power," Braun adds.

Extremists in Canada are just as paranoic. But in Scheinberg's opinion, the extreme right here pales in comparison to racist movements in Western Europe and the United States. And membership in Canadian hate groups is proportionately lower than in the United States.

In a survey of the far right in Canada, Scheinberg says that the Ku Klux Klan enjoyed its greatest success in Saskatchewan back in the late 1920s, and that "the first truly right-wing extremist organization" in this country was led by Adrien Arcand in Quebec.

Scheinberg considers the Toronto-based Heritage Front a menace because of its propensity for crime and violence. And he points out that desecrations of synagogues and cemeteries, as well as assaults against visible minorities, have marked the trail of Canada's neo-Nazi skinheads.

Be that as it may, he sees no strong, united extremist network functioning in Canada.

Casting his gaze at the United States, Scheinberg claims that the Ku Klux Klan is now a splintered, faction-ridden organization, but is still potentially dangerous. The skinhead movement has grown, as have the militias. But the Liberty Lobby, he warns, is perhaps the most effective extremist group in terms of propaganda and political action.

In Britain, support for the extreme right remains electorally insignificant, David Matas writes in another essay. But in France, the National Front, headed by Jean-Marie Le Pen, has become a "credible player" on the political scene.

Germany, given its past, will be of particular interest to readers. In his monograph, Ian Kagedan makes two telling points:

• There is not much evidence of direct, ongoing links between the more formal extreme right-wing parties and the generally youthful extremists who have committed acts of racist and xenophobic violence.

• The majority of Germans reject the world view of extreme right-wingers.

Jews remain constant object of animosity

In Eastern Europe and in the former Soviet Union, the fall of Communism has coincided with the emergence of parties and movements which blend right-wing and left-wing extremism.

Extremism in Poland — home to 3.3 million Jews before the Holocaust — is a marginal phenomenon, but that could change, Braun thinks. Anti-Semitism in Poland, he explains, functions as a rejection of liberalism and of democratic values, and thus threatens Polish society.

Hungary, with the largest Jewish community in Central Europe, has managed to keep extremism in check. However, political anti-Semitism is a powerful and growing force there.

There is no far-right international movement with global objectives, Michi Ebata states. But extremist groups do maintain transnational contacts, exchange anti-Semitic propaganda material and have discovered the Internet.

As an example, he cites the case of Ernst Zundel, the German-born Toronto propagandist who has launched short-wave radio programs and a television show from the United States.

"In 1935 the American novelist Sinclair Lewis' work It Can't Happen Here was published. Lewis warned Americans that fascism could triumph in their own land. We are far from the social-political context of the 1930s... Still, in an amazingly short time the extreme right has made rapid gains...

"Extremism does not pose an immediate political threat to take power in the nations included in this work. Yet prudence and respect for human rights demand that citizens and their governments act now, while there is still time."

Braun's prescription for combatting extremism is democracy. As he puts it: "The best protection against extremism [is] the successful transition to a pluralistic democracy — to a political system where there is a well-rooted legal order and a strong and independent judiciary to safeguard it."

Purim's hidden truths

This year, a leap year, we add an extra month, Adar I, to the Hebrew calendar.

Ordinarily, people associate Adar with Purim, which does not occur until next month, Adar II. With the extra month of Adar I, we are afforded the opportunity to prepare our thoughts with an eye toward the upcoming holiday.

The Torah readings this month contain a section which raises pertinent questions with regard to Purim — encountering hidden truths.

Rabbis in the Talmud have spoken at great length about the theme of "hidden reality" as it appears in the Purim scroll. Esther hides her identity as a Jew; Mordecai hides his relationship with Esther; G-d hides Divine intervention from the observer. The people within the Purim story are continuously dealing with the dual level of appearance and concealment.

Interestingly, the Torah portion this month recounts a request made by Moses to G-d, which deals with the need to confront that which is ultimately hidden. Moses asks to see G-d's face.

While atop Mount Sinai, Moses appeals to G-d to reveal the Divine face visually. Moses' encounters with G-d have been very visual from the start and therefore the request is consistent with the relationship. G-d must deny this request, stating that a human being cannot see the Divine and continue to live. In other words, in viewing G-d with our eyes we would cross a line which would take us out of the realm of humanity.

Yet G-d's love for Moses does not allow G-d to dismiss the request entirely. G-d compromises by covering Moses' eyes, passing the Divine Presence over Moses' face and then uncovering his eyes allowing Moses to see only G-d's back.

G-d has accommodated Moses in the best way possible while preserving Moses' humanity. Yet even this compromise has repercussions, for the text relates that after Moses returns to the people his face is emanating light to such a degree that no one could bear to sit in his presence. Moses must now hide his face behind a veil when speaking to another person.

Because he has even remotely had his request to see G-d's face accommodated, Moses can never again speak face-to-face with another human being. The mere glimpse of an encounter with G-d results in a separation of Moses from all people for all time. Moses asks to see what must remain hidden and we are taught the lesson of human limitations.

In the Purim story, Mordecai asks Esther to approach the king and plead for her people. Esther refuses and Mordecai suggests to her that perhaps she has been made queen solely for this moment. Perhaps her life's destiny culminates in this opportunity to save her people. The question is never answered; the truth of her destiny remains hidden from us.

Purim opens the door to a world of hidden truths. Moses shows us that what is hidden far surpasses what can be sought. Somewhere between Esther and Moses we must all find our place.

Searching for fool's gold

My uncles, aunts and cousins on the Glicenstein side always perk up when I mention the huge unclaimed fortune that is supposedly hidden somewhere in our extended family tree.

Their eyes grow big when they hear that an alleged distant cousin of ours, a wealthy brewery owner, supposedly died intestate (without an heir) in Texas sometime between 1900 and 1910, leaving at least $3 million unclaimed. The figure goes up to $40 million in some versions of the story.

I first heard the tale about a decade ago from a certain Mr. Gluckstein, a second cousin once removed whom I tracked down from a listing in the Toronto phone book. Since then, variations have reached me from four other widely-separated sources.

To this day, distant Glicensteins relations scattered around the world who know little or nothing of each other still recount handed-down anecdotes about the lawyers who offered to help their grandparents collect the inheritance in exchange for a stiff fee in advance and an eventual cut of the bounty. According to Mr. Gluckstein, his family rejected the lawyers' offer because the risks seemed too great and the terms too steep.

Another new-found relation, Mr. Glickenstein of Brooklyn, identified the rich brewer as a great-uncle of his father. By Glickenstein's account, the man had left Russia-Poland to avoid the army, had worked in a brewery in England, and had moved about 1890 to Texas and thereafter founded a brewery of his own.

Glickenstein's father, the owner of a coat factory in Lodz, reportedly sold it about 1910 upon hearing of the unclaimed millions awaiting him in America. I've heard of other relations who likewise left the Lodz area for America with the identical dream of acquiring the Glicenstein fortune. Not one of them ever saw a penny of it.

Although I've found a Glicenstein wine merchant in 19th-century London, I've never found a trace of the brewer in Texas censuses, death registries, ship's passenger lists and other sources. Was he a fantasy concocted by bogus lawyers as part of a sophisticated scam?

Like most undocumented family stories, this one must be regarded with some skepticism. I have heard of only one instance where a Jewish genealogist came into some money as a result of his research. Years ago, the now-defunct journal Toledot reported that someone found a distant cousin who had died alone in a Manhattan apartment, leaving a few thousand dollars stashed in a mattress. Hardly the stuff of dreams.

Recently I discovered evidence that the elusive Glicenstein fortune may have been a hoax all along. Charlotte Sholod, a New York art historian, has informed me that Emanuel Romano, son of sculptor Chanoch (Enrico) Glicenstein, recorded a relevant episode in his unpublished memoirs.

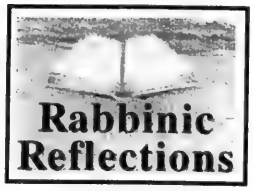
About 1909, when Romano was a schoolboy in Rome, a teacher showed him a newspaper headline – "$40 Million Inheritance Left by a Rich American Uncle" – and asked if it were true.

Romano wrote: "I had already heard that my relatives were speaking of this, and I said, 'Yes, it is true.' Morino [the teacher] opened his eyes and his mouth – 'Forty million dollars? Are you sure this uncle is a member of your family?' I answered that a cousin of ours was in contact with lawyers in the United States. Morino's eyes became still larger. 'Well, you will become a very rich boy,' said he in a wondering air. I did not answer, but my expression was of a boy who was sure that the inheritance would come his way...

"During that whole year he continuously asked me for news about the inheritance, and I continued to tell him about the progress of our lawyers in getting it. But we knew that the whole story was a hoax. Yet on this hoax, a cousin – Wilhelm Scwarz of Warsaw – lived on credit for a whole year..."

Hoax or not, such a tale is worth its weight in gold, and makes a welcome chapter in any family history. The plain truth is that family tree research is usually a slow, laborious process that involves considerable out-of-pocket expenses for postage, photocopies, archival fees and so on. While it offers its own significant rewards, material gain is rarely one of them.

Has some aspect of your family tree research got you stumped? Write to The CJN, Roots & Remembrance, 1500 Don Mills Rd., Suite 205, North York M3B 3K4, and your query may be answered in a future column. Sorry, no personal replies will be made.



Two to one is murder

By RABBI IRWIN ZEPLOWITZ

Do you have sayings or jokes that only people in your family know? We have one: "Two to one is murder."

It began when three of us were trying to decide where to go for dinner. After a lengthy discussion two of us decided on chicken. The third wanted pizza. "I don't want chicken tonight!," the hardy individualist said. "Too bad," was our retort, "two to one is murder." Thus was born a phrase we have used countless times since then when we need to come to some resolution of a family debate.

This phrase expresses a powerful philosophical absolute that majority rules. We are not alone in our belief. In a myriad of ways we make decisions by voting in order to determine the will of the majority. Many assume that the rule of the majority is a democratic principle which has its origins in modernity. Yet in Judaism, too, the principle of the majority has a long and honored history. In the Talmud the majority principle (called rov) is established as a basic tenet of Jewish law.

A famous passage in Bava Metzia 59b illustrates this through a story about Rabbi Eliezer and the sages. Though a Divine Voice sided with Rabbi Eliezer, the law went according to the sages, for they represented the majority opinion.

As ingrained and seemingly sacrosanct as this notion of majority rule may appear to be, it does have limitations. In this week's Torah portion, Mishpatim, we are reminded, "You shall not side with the mighty to do wrong..." (Exodus 23:2) One interpretation is that fairness should be rendered in judgment. Justice should be our guiding light, not status or fortune.

The Hebrew of this verse can, however, be understood differently. The term for "mighty" (rabim) can also be understood as "majority."

The verse, therefore, might be teaching us not to side with a majority when it does wrong. Abraham Ibn Ezra comments that this verse warns us against trusting a majority without question. Yes, the majority should be listened to, but not if what they advocate is evil. Majority rule without justice is a perversion.

At the end of a century that has seen nations torn apart by fascism and racism, this is a warning worth bearing in mind. In Nazi Germany, in the former Yugoslavia, in Rwanda...the majority believed that because they had the power, they could do what they wished to those who opposed them. "Two to one is murder" has, tragically, been all too true in our age.

It is, of course, difficult to judge when one should, in all good conscience, oppose the majority. How can we apply the insights of our traditions to the realities of our lives? When is opposition to the majority simply self-indulgence and when is it truly a search for justice?

While no law can define the limits of every situation, our Torah portion does guide us towards taking extra care with those who have less power, in greater need and whom the majority can easily dismiss. First, we must "not subvert the rights of (the) poor." (Exodus 23:6) Second, we cannot "oppress a stranger, for you know the feelings for the stranger, having yourselves been strangers in the land of Egypt." (Exodus 23:9)

The great danger to a majority is to make laws and structure society in a way which tramples upon the rights of the few if it is done for the benefit of the many. Torah reminds us, however, that if we treat those without power unjustly, "two to one" is worthy of condemnation. In a hierarchy of values, "majority rules" is important, but not greater than God's demand that we care for those in need.

Honoring foster parents

By MURRAY TEITEL
Special to The CJN

The first speaker at a dinner held to honor Jewish foster parents in Toronto had orange spiked hair, multiple nose rings and wore construction boots and a dress. She was followed by a rabbi with a black hat, a long black coat and a beard.

Though he may have personally disapproved of her style, the rabbi began by telling the audience that he had been greatly moved by the first speaker's words. A teenager, she had run away from home and ended up living on the street abusing drugs. When she had hit rock bottom, she called Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS), which placed her with a foster mother with whom she was still living. She was in her final year of high school and hoped to be accepted to university.

The rabbi went on to talk about the Jewish concept of gemiluth hassadim (the doing of good deeds). He had noticed that it is often those people who have many children and lead busy lives who find the time and the energy to become involved in doing good things for other people. "Chesed gorer chesed," he said. One act of kindness fosters another.

Given the recipients of that year's Foster Parents of the Year Award, his remarks could not have been more apt. With three children of their own, they had over the years, taken in no fewer than 15 foster children, many on a long-term basis. In her very brief acceptance speech, the wife said that her mother's house always had foster children. She could not imagine living in a house without foster children. End of story.

It was clear to all those present that she did not view herself as particularly noble and did not understand why she and her husband were being publicly honored for doing no more than following her parents' example.

She and her husband go about performing their kind deeds in their quiet, unassuming, modest way because it is in their nature to do so.

Nor would I call this couple atypical to Toronto's Jewish (and, I would assume, non-Jewish) foster parents. Another woman has over the course of 21 years cared for more than 75 children with disabilities. No matter how severe the child's disability, she has never turned a single one down.

In performing their acts of goodness as anonymously as their circumstances permit, these and other foster parents are, in effect, an example of what the greatest Jewish philosopher of all times, Maimonides, had in mind when he ranked charitable acts.

For Maimonides, the highest form of charity occurs when the donor and recipient are unknown to each other. That, of course, is impossible in the context of foster parenting. However, avoiding public honor and, above all, ensuring that the recipient does not feel himself or herself the object of charity makes the conduct of these people most worthy in the Maimonidean tradition.

JF&CS needs foster parents right now. The agency would like to hear from any Jewish adult interested in becoming a foster parent. If you have room in your heart and your home to be a foster parent, call Selma Elzas at JF&CS, 416-638-7800.

If you become a foster parent, you will not have your name on the side of a building. A street will not be rededicated in your honor. You will get more. If you become a foster parent, you will get the satisfaction of helping a child who is the victim of unfortunate circumstances. This is worth much more. Those to whom it comes naturally do not want the pleasure they get performing good deeds adulterated by public recognition. Maimonides, of course, was right.

Study of Canadian Jewry chair launched at York

TORONTO — The Centre for Jewish Studies at York University is to be the home of a new Chair for the Study of Canadian Jewry.

Toronto philanthropist and retired businessman and lawyer J. Richard Shiff has given the lead gift toward the establishment of the chair and will be involved in a campaign to raise the remaining funds.

"This will be the first chair anywhere for the study of Canadian Jewry," says Shiff, former president, CEO and chairman of the board of Bramalea Ltd. "The Jews in Canada have made a tremendous contribution to the country. It's important to know this in our multicultural society."

"Despite being one of the youngest universities in Ontario, York has one of the oldest, largest and best developed Jewish Studies programs," says centre director Michael Brown. He notes that courses in Jewish studies were first offered at York in 1968; the Centre for Jewish Studies was founded in 1988; the Jewish Teacher Education Program is "unique" outside Israel.

"As for the chair," he said, "it's a natural development. A number of York scholars in history, sociology and literature have made this university the pre-eminent institution for Canadian Jewish studies. We have been so for more than a decade."

Subjects with Jewish themes offered

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The newly formed Canadian Centre for German and European Studies, established jointly by York University and the Université de Montréal, will offer courses in Jewish subjects.

The centre, scheduled to be officially inaugurated on Sept. 11, will work closely with York University's Jewish Studies Centre.

"We're just delighted that it's coming here," said Michael Brown, director of York University's Jewish Studies Centre.

"We have three, four people who work on the Holocaust, and I assume that the German studies program will cross-list these courses."

Mark Webber, a York University professor of German literature and a founding co-director of the Canadian Centre for German and European Studies, said a variety of graduate-level courses in several disciplines will be offered.

"We'll look at contemporary Germany, and clearly, Jewish themes will be relevant," said Webber, currently on sabbatical at the University of Konstanz in southern Germany.

In a quest to find German-Jewish partners for the centre, Webber has held discussions with officials at the Moses Mendelssohn Centre in Potsdam and the Simon Dubnow Institute in Leipzig.

The centre, one of the only ones of its kind in Canada according to Webber, is being funded by the German Academic Exchange Service, York University and the Université de Montréal.

Born in St. Louis, Mo., Webber holds graduate and post-graduate degrees from Harvard and Yale. Now a Canadian citizen, he was formerly head of adult education at Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto.

A member of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights, Webber received Germany's equivalent of the Order of Canada in 1993 for fostering German-Jewish understanding.

A specialist in 19th century German literature (the Young Germans) and the works of Franz Kafka, Webber said his parents lost relatives during the Holocaust in Lithuania and Russia.

Germans he has met have expressed curiosity and satisfaction that a non-German has mastered their language and delved so deeply into their body of literature.

"In some cases, I'm the only Jew they've ever met," said Webber.

Partnership 2000

Toronto & Eilat-Eilot tighten ties

A new partnership is emerging between UJA Federation, the city of Eilat and the neighbouring regional municipality of Eilot.

For more than a decade UJA Federation has been helping to develop the Israeli communities of Beit Dagan, Kfar Gvirol and Eilat-Eilot, through Project Renewal. Libraries, community centres, daycare facilities and social, cultural and educational programs, have improved thousands of lives in these areas.

But while Project Renewal work continues, a new partnership between Eilat-Eilot and Toronto, is designed to take Israel-Diaspora relations to the next level.

"Partnership 2000 focuses on projects that build meaningful links between Toronto Jews and residents of Eilat-Eilot as equal partners," explains Randy Shiff, who co-chairs Toronto's Project Renewal/Partnership 2000 committee with Bill Kassel.

"Our role," explains Shiff, "is not just to provide funding but rather to act as a catalyst for new innovative ways of working together, and to offer, where appropriate, our expertise and experience in addition to funding."

"It's a more mutually beneficial relationship whereby Israelis and Torontonians both have something to offer each other," adds Kassel.

One project sent Canadian students, who were on a one year study program at Tel-Aviv University, down to the Arava Environmental Studies Institute near Eilat to conduct environmental research.

"The people to people projects are the essence of what Partnership 2000 means," maintains Shiff. Last year, Toronto contributed $600,000 to Partnership 2000 projects including the El Ami program which is the only provider of Jewish education in the region for elementary school students; the Early Childhood Technology Centre to buy equipment to upgrade science skills; the Treatment Kindergarten for children with special needs; Operation MATI, which helps to foster entrepreneurial start-ups and a three year, $60,000 teaching upgrade program.

UJA Federation's Director of Jewish Continuity Programming, Susan Jackson, and Partnership 2000 steering committee co-chair Randy Shiff visit an air-conditioned tent built by Partnership 2000 on Kibbutz Hevel Eilot. The new tent makes it possible to extend school hours during the hottest time of the day.

Shiff is particularly excited about the Educational Leadership Exchange planned for this year. Teachers from Eilat-Eilot will travel to Toronto to work on curriculum development with their counterparts in Jewish day schools. "This is a good example," according to Shiff "of real ways we can benefit from the two-way relationship."

"The warm relations that have developed over the past few years between the residents of Eilat and the Jewish community of Toronto represent the true, close relations that we should develop with Diaspora Jewish communities throughout the world," says Eilat Mayor Gabi Kadosh.

Institute is a breath of fresh air

A new environmental studies facility near Eilat is doing as much to improve relations between Arabs and Jews, as it is to improve the environment.

The Arava Institute, on Kibbutz Ketura in the Eilot region, is just one of many UJA Federation Partnership 2000 projects improving the quality of life in Israel's most southern region.

"The environment has no borders," says institute director Alon Tal. "I view this institute as a cadre of environmentalists that will promote peace and environmental responsibility through the exchange of ideas and expertise."

The creation of a new computer lab has made it possible for Arava students to send each other e-mail, listen to lectures, surf the Internet and even complete exams. "For the first time, Arabs who come to study from Jordan and Jews can log on to a direct link with each other and the rest of the world," explains Tal, who feels Israelis and Arabs have common environmental concerns that could be better dealt with as a team working together.

Tal is currently developing student exchange programs with the Arava Institute, York University and U of T.

Three Torontonians studying at Tel-Aviv University recently spent a semester at the institute as part of their course in environmental studies. Adam Maerov single-handedly increased the institute's library of periodicals by 30%. Daniella Kiguel helped to expand organic agriculture on the kibbutz and Malkie Spodeck taught kibbutz residents how to run their own composting program.

UJA Federation makes a campus call

University of Toronto and York University students welcomed a new face to school last week.

UJA on Campus days, which drew interest from Jews and non-Jews, familiarized students with the work UJA Federation does in Toronto's Jewish community, in Israel and around the world.

Booths with representatives from UJA Federation beneficiary agencies such as Reena, Jewish Family and Child Service and the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, offered students a wide range of volunteer opportunities.

Curious passersby sampled Israeli cuisine, purchased necklaces with Hebrew names and checked out a variety of Israel Experience programs. Rabbi Michael Skobac, from UJA Federation's Jewish Campus Services (JCS), manned the "Ask the Rabbi" booth.

"A lot of people were asking about the holidays," observed Skobac. "One person even asked me about the meaning of life."

Fourth year student Stephanie Zwicker said having a UJA presence on campus was a "great way to expose people who would normally not be involved with what goes on in the Jewish community."

"A program like this one," explained Pearl Gropper, director of York's Jewish Student Federation, "reinforces Jewish life on campus and allows unaffiliated students to explore links to their Jewish identity."

JCS Director Zac Kaye said he was pleased with the cross-section of Jewish students who wandered by the displays. "We want the students to know that UJA Federation offers something for everyone."

UJA Days co-ordinator, Johanna Levitt, said the program was so successful "many students have asked us to do it again next year."

Jewish Family and Child Service volunteer coordinator Joan Stevens hands U of T student Ivan Diamond a brochure describing JF&CS volunteer opportunities.

Champion of children honoured on 90th birthday

Henry Goodman, the man who pioneered many Jewish community human services, turned 90 last week. He celebrated, among other achievements, more than 60 years of assistance to people in need.

Goodman served as President of Jewish Family and Child Service, a UJA Federation beneficiary agency, during the 1960's, when he led the way in developing programs to improve the lives of children.

In 1984, Goodman began the successful Friends of JF&CS campaign, which raised enough money to build a home for children with special needs.

"Children are our future," explains Goodman, who continues to be heavily involved in the Friends campaign. "JF&CS was my first love because they take care of people from birth to death and that's what being Jewish is about."

Goodman also dedicated much of his volunteer time to UJA Federation, first as president of the United Jewish Welfare Fund, then as one of the founding members of the Social Planning Committee which he chaired for seven years. Jewish Information Service was created under Goodman's chairmanship.

"Henry brought a tremendous vision to Federation which helped put social planning on the map," recalls Madeleine Epstein, who followed Goodman as chair of the committee.

"He had a real understanding of the social fabric of the community," remembers Michael Benjamin, who also served as social planning chairman. "He was one of the best authorities around on Jewish continuity."

To honour Goodman's 90th birthday and his many years of dedication to the community, JF&CS has established the Henry and Jenne Goodman Scholarship Fund, which will enable crown wards to pursue post-secondary education.

If you would like to make a contribution to the fund call (416) 638-7800 ext. 214.

U of T students express their Jewish pride at UJA Day which took place at the campus' Sid Smith Building.

Thank You

UJA Federation would like to thank 13 year old Hadassah Rosenthal for volunteering her time to catalogue and update our video library. We wish Hadassah good luck and hope she comes back to visit soon.

Out in Front plugs in young adults

Want to become more connected to your Jewish community?

On Wednesday, February 12 at 7:00 p.m, The Game Room, 449 Walmer Road, UJA Federation's Young Leadership Cabinet is hosting an Out in Front information session for 25-40 year olds interested in exploring volunteer opportunities.

Participants will meet volunteers and hear how they got started, assisting UJA Federation and its beneficiary agencies.

Anthony Morris, who attended last year's Out In Front program, became involved with UJA Federation's Young Business Network. Morris recently returned from the Yachdav '96 Young Leadership Mission to Basel, Switzerland and Israel.

Other participants volunteered as tutors for children at Jewish Family and Child Service and campaigners at UJA Federation telethons.

For Cindy Pedvis, who became involved with UJA Federation's Young Adult Network (YAN) seven years ago, volunteering in the community has brought "a great sense of pride." She'll be speaking at Out in Front about YAN programs, including the recent Chanuka party for children at the Bathurst Jewish Centre. Pedvis co-chairs YAN with Richard Lewin and Jay Stochinsky.

"Out in Front is a great way for Toronto newcomers to get to know people," notes Jacqueline Valmont who is co- chairing the session with David Rashkovan.

Conservative Judaism gets first campus rep

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Adam Silver

TORONTO — The Jewish Conservative movement now has an official presence on Toronto university campuses.

In August, Adam Silver, 25, became the campus fieldworker for Koach, an offshoot of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism. Koach was instituted by the U.S.-based umbrella organization to reach out to college students.

Silver's position, the only one of its kind in Canada and one of very few in North America, is a pilot project which represents a three-way collaboration between Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (in whose office he is based), the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Ontario region, and a local Koach committee made up of lay people within the Conservative movement. The project is supported by the New York-based national United Synagogue.

A 1994 history graduate of York University, Silver has a strong background in the Conservative movement. While in university he worked as youth director at Adath Israel Congregation. After graduation, he left Toronto for Minneapolis, where he served for almost a year as regional youth director for the Central States and Provinces region of United Synagogue.

He returned here to become national director of Network, which ceased operations due to withdrawal of funding by the Council of Jewish Federations Canada last summer.

A self-described "shul kid," Silver grew up attending services regularly at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, where he has served as youth adviser and of which his father Norman is a past president. His mother, Judy, is a past sisterhood president.

Last year, when Network was housed at Jewish Campus Services (JCS) of Greater Toronto, Silver would often brainstorm with JCS director Zac Kaye about ways to better serve the student population.

Toronto campuses have a large number of Conservative students, many of whom have not been involved in existing Jewish groups, said Silver. "Certain needs were identified through focus groups."

After a meeting with Chicago-based Koach director Richard Moline at last year's United Synagogue Youth convention held in Toronto, it was determined there was "a potentially big enough demand to try servicing these students."

Silver is quick to point out that the initiative came from Toronto and that local Conservative shuls have taken an active role.

"They realized this is a priority, reaching out to the next generation. There's a void. Shuls provide programs for ages four to 18, but not a specifically geared program until you hit the young adult stage or get married."

Koach aims to fill a gap and reach uninvolved students, explained Silver. So far they have 150 people on their mailing list.

"This is where the partnership is very nice. You have to be conscious of not overlapping and not having redundant programming. We're trying to provide a service within the existing structure."

Silver has an office at JCS and recently oversaw Koach's first large-scale program, a relaxed, camp-style Shabbat dinner held at Beth Tikvah Congregation in partnership with the shul's young adult committee.

Sixty-eight students showed up, at least 10 of whom had learned of the dinner through a synagogue mailing, not their campus group. "It was a nice demonstration of how a partnership can work."

Discussion on the spirit of Shabbat continued until after the dinner was over, Silver said. Future plans include another Shabbat dinner and more educational programming on campus.

Although students have been involved in organizing programs, there are no plans to form a student executive, because focus group studies showed that many students just didn't have the time to become involved to that extent, said Silver.

CORRECTION

In the article, "Professor creates database on the Holocaust" (CJN, Dec. 12), the description of a book published by the Auschwitz Foundation of Belgium states that 60,000 people were taken from Belgium to the concentration camps.

There were in fact 57,000 registered Jews in Belgium, plus an estimated 12,000 unregistered. Twenty-five thousand were deported and 1,000 of those deported survived, notes Alain Goldschläger of the Institute for Holocaust Literature of the University of Western Ontario.

The CJN regrets the error.

Tu b'Shvat celebrated at Promenade Mall

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — While chilling winter winds blustered outdoors, trees and foliage were the focus of indoor festivities at the Tu b'Shvat celebration held recently at the Promenade Mall in Thornhill.

The event, sponsored by the Jewish National Fund (JNF), included performances by David Brant, Maytal Golan and choirs from Leo Baeck Day School, Bialik Hebrew Day School and Associated Hebrew Schools. Purchasers of trees for Israel were given tickets to play carnival games run by several Jewish youth groups.

The Israeli consul, Irit Waidergorn, brought greetings from the Jewish state. JNF president Tom Ungar welcomed the audience.

"It's symbolic that in Israel they're eating the first fruit from the trees...Jewish National Fund has as its mandate to plant trees and take care of the greenery, Ungar said."

Event co-chairs Marla Dadoun and Barry Ganz told The CJN they were thrilled with the large turnout.

JNF executive director Ben Prossin said the mall venue, a first for this event, provided excellent exposure for JNF. "We figure several thousand people walked through the mall and saw the performances and the exhibits."

He said the event went so well that he envisions holding a similar bash next year, but on a larger scale in order to involve more schools.

The festivities marked the kickoff for the annual Tu b'Shvat telethon which took place Feb 2, he said. Telemarketing lines, donated by a JNF supporter were staffed by 100 volunteers.

Those missed by the telethon can call 638-7200 to buy trees and support JNF.

Toronto Jews send medical supplies to Ukraine

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A defibrillator, which regulates heart beats, and two heart monitors were among 500 pounds of medical supplies airlifted to the Jewish community of Ukraine from Toronto.

The airlift was comprised of samples donated by local physicians. In Kiev, the supplies were distributed by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee.

The shipment was arranged by Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, in cooperation with the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, Bruno Rubinger, Congress executive member, reported to a recent meeting of the region executive.

A Chanukah shipment to Cuba flown to Havana in the private jet of Toronto film mogul Robert Lantos was gratefully received by the Jewish community there, Rubinger also reported.

Through the ma'ot chittin fund, the shipment included 75 boxes of potato pancake mix, 10 boxes of chocolate Chanukah gelt, 100 cans of sardines, 100 cans of tuna fish, decaffeinated coffee, a large quantity of pasta and religious supplies of 50 tallitot and two gross of kippot.

Helga Stephenson, chair of Viacom Canada, who flew to the Havana film festival with Lantos, personally delivered the supplies just two hours after her arrival.

Both shipments were arranged by the Ontario region's world Jewry and international affairs committee.

Jack Cole revolutionized bookselling concept

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — World-famous book seller Jack Cole died recently at Princess Margaret Hospital. He was 76.

A high school drop-out in the 1930s, Jack Cole, along with his late brother Carl, built Coles Books into one of the biggest bookstore chains in the world.

He was born Jack Colofsky, but his father, a cabinet maker who came to Canada from Russia in 1912, changed the family name to Cole.

Growing up in the Bathurst-Dundas area, Cole quit Harbord Collegiate in Grade 12 and went to work with his brother who had opened a Bloor St. West store where they bought and sold used school books.

Four years later, in 1940, a second store was opened at Yonge and Charles Streets, which also specialized in school texts.

During World War II, Cole served in the Royal Canadian Air Force.

The yellow-and-black striped Coles Notes, developed by the two brothers, went on to become the world's best-selling study guides.

In 1978 when Coles Books was sold to the Southam company, the price tag was almost $34 million. At the time there were 164 Coles stores, 126 in Canada and 38 in the United States. In 1986, Coles Notes wre being sold in 73 countries. In 1990, when the company marked the 50th anniversary of the first store, there were 222 outlets.

In 1980, Cole oversaw the opening of the company's World's Biggest Bookstore. The Toronto emporium was a precursor of the giant superstores, Chapters, which was formed when Coles Books merged with the SmithBooks chain in April 1995.

He leaves his wife, Esther, daughters Norma and Linda, sons David and Jeffrey, and 16 grandchildren.

Services were held at Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel and burial was in the Temple Sinai section of Pardes Shalom cemetery.

Kashrut changes cause controversy in Calgary

By JUDY SHAPIRO
Special to The CJN

CALGARY — A change in policy on Calgary Kosher (CK) supervision in local synagogues has created controversy and debate within the community.

CK is the community-run kashrut supervision program, which operates under guidelines set by the Calgary Rabbinical Council (CRC) and the Calgary Jewish Community Council (CJCC).

According to a position statement released to the CJCC board in December, the CRC decided in March 1996 to "remove the CK from ongoing daily supervision of all the synagogues in Calgary," leaving the day-to-day supervision of each institution's kashrut to its respective rabbi and/or administration.

"At the same time, the CRC adopted the halachic position that in order to supervise an ad-hoc function at the request of the hosting family or organization at one of the community's synagogues, it would be necessary to operate under the premise that the CK cannot use the synagogue's existing equipment and dishes.

"This is based on the reasoning that a kashrut organization cannot put its own endorsement on equipment it is not responsible for and does not supervise on a regular basis.

"Hence, it is necessary in such circumstances to implement a discrete kashering of the kitchen facility and use dishes belonging to the CK," the position statement said.

The board at Beth Tzedec Synagogue has objected to the need to re-kasher kitchens in order to adhere to CK standards.

"When the kitchen has to be re-kashered, it makes a statement," said Beth Tzedec president Isaac Aptowitzer. "The implication is that it's not up to standard, and that is not right."

David Isaac, who represented the synagogue at the CJCC meeting, argued that the new standards were "imposed" on Beth Tzedec and were never agreed to by the congregation.

In the synagogue's view, the old rules, under which the rabbi was responsible for a shul's kashrut but the community mashgiach could come and go at will, were acceptable.

In a statement read out to Beth Tzedec congregants on Jan. 11, the synagogue's board and executive stated unequivocally that the shul's kitchens are kosher. The statement went on to describe the measures taken by the congregation to maintain kashrut.

However, the rabbinical council does not claim to judge the kashrut of any particular synagogue.

The CRC's statement reads: "It is important to state unequivocally that at no time did the Calgary Rabbinical Council call into question the integrity of the kosher status of any synagogue's kitchens."

As president Nate Feldman told the CJCC board, "the policy is not here to comment on the level of kashrut at any given facility. If anybody wants the CK stamp on a function, there must be a common set of standards."

In the view of Temple B'nai Tikvah Rabbi Jordan Goldson, who is also chair of the Calgary Rabbinical Council, the new policy is not about whether any synagogue is kosher, but simply a matter of supervision.

"From a halachic point of view, if we are going to have a CK standard, it has to operate in this way," Rabbi Goldson said.

The problem with the old policy, Rabbi Goldson said, is that two systems were operating in parallel — rabbinic and CK supervision.

"You can't have two systems together unless you treat them blindly," said Rabbi Goldson. And when it comes to kashrut and halachah, two systems are impossible.

"If an event is going to be kosher, someone has to be responsible and say 'yes, it's a kosher affair,' " explained Rabbi Goldson. To meet CK standards, that person must be the community mashgiach.

"This is not a question of the qualifications of a rabbi to serve as a mashgiach, but of the availability of the rabbi," Rabbi Goldson said, explaining that because of their other duties, rabbis often don't have time to supervise every aspect of a kitchen's operations, including delivery of food to its preparation and presentation.

Rabbi Shulman told the CJCC board that the first time the new policy was put into place was at his shul, House of Jacob-Mikveh Israel. A bar mitzvah host requested CK supervision, and the synagogue's kitchen was kashered and the community dishes were used, in accordance with the new policy.

Rabbi Goldson pointed out that several meetings have been held with Beth Tzedec to discuss the issue.

"They've made the decision not to operate according to the standards of CK," Rabbi Goldson said. "They have every right to do that. We had hoped to work out an agreement whereby CK could come in an unobtrusive manner" but so far, there has been no success in the negotiations.

Campaign goals may be exceeded

By MOURA WOLPERT
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — It's not over but so far, it's been challenging and successful, said outgoing United Jewish Appeal (UJA) co-chair Cheryl Klein at the recent Hamilton-Wentworth & Area Jewish Federation-UJA annual general meeting.

Klein, who has co-chaired the UJA campaign with Rick Black for the past three years, reported on the 1996-97 campaign. Projections indicate, she said, that it will not only meet its target, but will exceed it provided outstanding pledges are collected.

This year's campaign introduced "plus giving," a program first used in Vancouver, under which donors can designate 50 percent of their "plus" gift to an agency of their choice.

One positive result of plus giving, Klein said, has been greater cooperation between UJA and local institutions and organizations. As well, it brought about "a new dialogue" between donors and canvassers.

And proof of its success was in the cheque Klein was able to hand to the Hamilton Hebrew Academy, Adas Israel Synagogue and the Beth Jacob school and synagogue.

Another success story has been Midrasha, the community school of continuing Jewish education for high school students. Founded by Dr. Judah Denburg of the McMaster University Medical school and Prof. Adele Reinhartz of the department of religious studies, the school is now in its third year.

Reflecting on the highlights of the past year, Federation president George Czutrin recalled community events that involved children and teenagers in various tzedakah projects.

Plans for the future include a community endowment fund and the appointment of a professional endowment director to be shared by the Hamilton, Windsor and London communities.

Incoming board members were installed by immediate past president David Steinberg. While Czutrin continues as president for another year, the new executive includes Cheryl Klein, president-elect; Al Rams, UJA campaign chair; Judah Denburg and Harvey Waxman, vice-presidents and Bill Halpren, treasurer.

Israel Day a success

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Despite bitter prairie cold, organizers of the recent first-ever "Israel Day At The Centre" were pleased at the turnout.

"There were quite a number of young people who came to check out our programs," says Reva Craven of the Israel Experience Centre-Winnipeg. "People really seemed to be seriously interested in what our programs have to offer."

The Israel Experience Centre, backed by the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council, was formed last June through an amalgamation of the Canadian Zionist Federation and Travel Israel. "We thought an Israel Fair highlighting programs for young adults would be a good program," says Craven.

Almost all Jewish organizations in the city were represented at the fair, which was co-sponsored by the YMHA Jewish Community Centre.

Visitors learned about summer programs and volunteer opportunities in Israel as well as the country's high school, university and religious programs. Israeli cuisine was available for sampling.

Presentations were made by Adam Minsky, national education director of the Canada Israel Experience Centre and Michael Litvack, national academic affairs co-ordinator of the Hebrew University.

The Israel Experience Centre-Winnipeg is looking forward to a bigger and better fair next year, says Craven. It's also planning an event for Yom Ha'atzmaut on May 12 in celebration of the 100th anniversary of the first World Zionist Conference, she says.

War crimes case

the Second World War and your association with organizations actively engaged in atrocities against the civilian population."

In a letter to Rock, Powell said "your officials falsely accused Vitols of personal complicity in atrocities against the civilian population and then backed off when confronted with the facts." He suggested Vitols "will have such strong community support when the case is made public that he will be able to raise enough funds to retain a leading litigation lawyer to sue the government" for abuse of process and malicious prosecution.

Powell concluded his letter saying "Vitols will not sue if the matter is dropped immediately. Nor does he demand an apology."

Powell told The CJN his father-in-law does not deny belonging to the organizations listed by the government, but that he was not involved in any war crimes. He said the government case is based on "guilt by association" and should be dropped.

A letter released by Powell, dated Dec. 23, 1996, from Justice Department lawyer Roslyn Levine, states "the murder of communist sympathizers in the forest near Madona in December 1941 will remain part of our case. The Crown will seek to rely on the evidence surrounding the...event, but will not seek to prove direct participation by Vitols in the atrocities. Rather, this evidence will be used to establish the atrocities committed by the various organizations with which Vitols was associated during his tenure with them."

Levine's letter goes on to allege that Vitols' rank in the Madona police and the 281st Schutzmannshaft Battalion was "lieutenant, company commander."

Powell said he sent copies of the correspondence to Canadian Jewish Congress, in part to seek their cooperation in opposing a wrongful prosecution but "more realistically" to ensure that Rock does not suffer politically if he drops the case.

"The case is politically sensitive and therefore I expect that only the minister in charge can make the necessary decision," Powell stated in a Jan. 20 letter to Rock. Powell said he had no intention of turning the case into one in which ethnic groups clash.

Bernie Farber, director of community relations for Congress, said "let the courts decide" the Vitols case.

Congress has always maintained "it's not an issue of ethnicity. It's a matter of truth and justice," he added.

Irving Abella, chair of Congress' war crimes committee, said "it would be a fundamental mistake to make it a community issue. It's an individual being charged, not the community. I think it would be a sad comment if the Latvian community came to [Vitols'] defence."

Meanwhile, both Farber and Abella criticized the head of the Justice Department's war crimes unit for failing to participate in a recent news conference in which U.S. investigator Steven Rambam turned over audio tapes of his meetings with alleged Nazi war criminals. They said Paul Vickery had been invited to attend, but sent two RCMP officers to receive the material instead.

"From our perspective, it was a win-win situation for the government," Abella said. "They could show the government was taking the issue seriously. By not showing up, it sent a symbolic message to the international media that they don't take the issue seriously."

Sims told The CJN he has full confidence in Vickery's commitment to the war crimes portfolio. "There is no one more hardworking and dedicated in Canada's war crimes program than Vickery," he said.

Turning to the Rambam news conference, he said Vickery "sent the right man for the job. If the boss of the unit ran out and did the job of the police, nothing would get done."

Sims pointed out a team of lawyers, lab technicians and RCMP officers worked on the material over the Christmas holidays.

Conversion bill

I would not change the status quo. There were one or two demands on me that we would not recognize conversions in North America and I refused."

On a question from Baltimore and Toronto on relations with Syria, Netanyahu said he welcomed a recent statement from the Syrian leader that peace is more important to Syria than it is to Israel.

"My sense is that the less said publicly about this the more possibility there is for beginning peace talks."

He said that within a decade, it is possible that the majority of the world's Jews will live in Israel.

The post-Hebron agreement with the Palestinians is more significant than the Hebron agreement itself, Netanyahu said. "Israel alone will designate the extent of redeployment in Judea and Samaria."

The prime minister said Palestinians have agreed they would have no political activity in Jerusalem and that his government is "looking into" a report that they have re-opened one political office. "We expect full compliance with the agreement,"

He said his government is planning to deregulate communications, cellular phones, and bus transportation and is hoping to privatize banks.

Nathanson served as mayor of New Waterford, NS

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Dr. Daniel Nathanson was remembered as a man with integrity, good judgment, a love of his community and the respect of all who worked with him during memorial services in New Waterford, N.S. recently.

Nathanson, 71, died Jan. 15 after a 20-year battle with cancer that doctors said would take his life within a year. "When he was told he had cancer, two doctors in Montreal suggested he take a trip around the world and get his affairs in order," recalled his brother Bernard (Nardy) of Halifax. "But those doctors both died a few years later and Dan lived on."

The Cape Breton physician and surgeon served his town as mayor from 1965 until 1976 when illness forced his resignation. Born and educated in Glace Bay, he studied pre-medicine at Mount Allison University in Sackville, N.B., and received his medical degree from Dalhousie University in Halifax in 1953. After post-graduate work, he came to New Waterford to practice in 1956 and remained there until his death.

He helped establish the New Waterford Hospital in 1963 which propelled him to the mayor's seat two years later. During his mayoralty terms, Breton Education Centre, a high school in New Waterford was built and he oversaw renovation of the town's school curriculum, making New Waterford a leader in provincial education.

He worked to successfully upgrade senior citizens housing, establish a much-needed nursing home and improve many municipal services necessary for small town survival.

Former New Waterford mayor Jerry Marsh, a council member during Nathanson's regime, said "he saw the needs of the community and worked for the betterment of the citizens."

Louis Mercer, another former mayor, said "Dr. Nathanson was one of the greatest politicians I have ever worked with. He always kept in mind the thoughts of the people of the community."

Jerry Ryan, chief administrative officer of the community who started working in the town during Nathanson's term, said he was visionary, a man ahead of his time. "The type of community New Waterford is today is due to his vision."

Nathanson lost use of his legs because of radiation treatment for cancer but continued to practice until a few years ago. Despite using a wheelchair, he was doing major surgery while strapped to a table, Nardy Nathanson said. "He finally had to give it up because after a couple of hours, his legs would tighten and lock."

He is survived by his wife, the former Edith Hirsch; sons, Garth Sydney and Ian; daughters, Sheila Nathanson Simmons and Norine; five grandchildren; brothers Lawrence, Bernard and Hilroy; sisters, Doreen (Gordon) and Norma.

Netanyahu, Arafat to meet in Erez for talks

By DAVID MAKOVSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat agreed last Sunday in Davos, Switzerland, to meet again at the Erez junction this week as the first step toward launching the security-related portions of the Hebron accord.

However, it remains unclear whether Israel is sufficiently organized to have assembled the negotiating teams needed for dealing with the issues at hand: the PA establishment of both an airport and seaport in Gaza; safe passage for Palestinians between Gaza and the West Bank; and release of Palestinian prisoners.

In a panel session last Sunday night at the World Economic Forum's conference, which brought together more than 1,000 corporate executives to meet with world leaders, Arafat complained that Israel is hurting the PA's economy and that Israel owes the PA hundreds of millions of dollars in tax rebates.

In his remarks, Netanyahu heralded Israel as one of the great hi-tech centres of the world and predicted that its per capita Gross National Product — currently $16,000 — will double within the next 10 years.

Netanyahu held separate meetings with Arafat and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak; as all three are attending the conference at the Swiss resort. The Mubarak-Netanyahu meeting is their first since the two met in Cairo, when their relationship subsequently deteriorated because the Egyptian leader accused Netanyahu of bad faith over the Hebron talks.

Mubarak emerged from the meeting with Netanyahu optimistic that a common basis for the resumption of talks between Israel and Syria will ultimately be found, but admitted this could be "a question of time."

"I believe Syria says it's ready to start the talks, even if it may have some reservations. But this is a question of time and it's bound to be resolved," he said.

Yet, U.S. officials privately suggest that Cairo and Damascus, which have worked closely together in the past, now differ on how to deal with Israel in the aftermath of the Hebron accord.

Statements by senior Egyptian officials over the weekend have suggested that progress on the Palestinian track will be key in paving the way for Israel to emerge from its regional isolation.

There are indications that Netanyahu's foreign policy adviser Dore Gold visited Oman last week in a bid to enhance ties.

In contrast, Syrian Vice-President Abdel Halim Khaddam and Foreign Minister Farouk Shara visited Gulf countries last week, urging them to keep the regional pressure on Israel and halt normalization until there is movement on the Syrian track. United Press International cited Syrian diplomatic sources in Damascus as saying that Khaddam and Shara will shortly continue their regional diplomatic drive to isolate Israel by visiting Algeria, Morocco, Libya and Tunisia.

Syria believes that only if Israel is isolated regionally will it be forced to accept Damascus' demands as a condition for renewing talks. Netanyahu utterly rejects the Syrian notion that in the past Israel committed itself to full withdrawal from the Golan and therefore he is bound to accept this idea if he wants talks to resume.

Speaking in Davos, Netanyahu suggested that Israel will not beg Syria to restart talks if Damascus is reluctant.

"I cannot force President Hafez al-Assad to resume the peace talks. If he wants to, we'll find the formula. If he doesn't want to, there can always be 100 reasons why we cannot start the peace talks."

Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai said peace talks with Syria cannot resume as long as there are attacks on IDF forces in Lebanon, but denied this was a condition for resuming peace negotiations with Damascus.

"We are interested in renewing the negotiations with the Syrians. Together with this we are telling the Syrians that political negotiations and progress in the peace process cannot progress with terror acts in Lebanon and other places against the State of Israel," Mordechai said to reporters during a tour of the Karni Crossing at the Gaza Strip.

It remained unclear if the Israeli-Egyptian relationship will quickly improve. Mubarak, as expected, did invite Netanyahu to Cairo, but there is no early date for such a meeting.

In return, Netanyahu extended one in an endless series of invitations to Mubarak to visit Israel, but Mubarak did not react. With the exception of Yitzhak Rabin's funeral, Mubarak has refused to visit Israel since assuming the Egyptian presidency in 1981.

Sharansky returns to Moscow

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — Semyon Tayts, an 11-year-old Jewish day school student, had never heard of the time when Hebrew instruction was forbidden.

For him, learning the language often involves nothing more difficult than looking up words in a computerized Russian-Hebrew dictionary.

His situation provided a stark contrast to the experiences of Natan Sharansky, who returned here last week as Israeli trade minister 11 years after he was released from a Soviet gulag.

During his visit, the former refusenik recalled how he and his friends strove to learn Hebrew secretly during the early 1970s. "Someone would write down the Hebrew lessons broadcast" by Israel Radio, Sharansky said. "Then, those who had learned 300 to 400 Hebrew words would be considered good language teachers."

Sharansky added that he was strongly impressed by the progress the Jewish community had made, especially in the area of education, since his departure from the former Soviet Union as part of a 1986 prisoner exchange with the West.

Discussions with teachers at Jewish schools in Moscow indicated that Russia had achieved much during the past decade in granting greater religious freedom, he said.

The Jewish educators complained about lack of funds and discussed proposed improvements in their schools' curricula, Sharansky told a news conference.

"Those were quite normal complaints I could have heard from any Jewish educator in any country," he said.

Sharansky, who came to Moscow with the formal mission of improving Russian-Israeli trade ties, said he considered his meetings with members of the Jewish community the highlight of his visit.

Those contacts with the community proved that Russian Jewish life is as rich and diverse as in other nations where the tradition of Jewish life had never been interrupted, he said.

"These meetings were not much different from those I've had in Jewish communities around the world," Sharansky said at one event last week, when he addressed more than 1,000 Moscow Jews in a packed concert hall.

During a visit to the Jewish day school where Tayts studies, Sharansky told a gathering of pupils what today's Russian Jewish revival means to him as a former dissident.

"Years ago, you had to fight against the regime in this country if you wanted just to be a Jew," he said. "I'm happy that this contradiction does not exist anymore."

Sharansky was the first member of the current Israeli cabinet to visit Russia. One of his primary responsibilities was to lay the groundwork for a visit by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, scheduled for next month.

Hebron deal seen as encouraging Syria to talks

By ELDAD BECK
AND HILLEL KUTTLER
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Egyptian Foreign Minister Amr Moussa said last week that Israeli withdrawal from remaining parts of Palestinian land is the key both to better relations with Egypt and progress towards peace with Syria.

Speaking at the Swiss resort of Davos, where he was attending the annual meeting of the World Economic Forum, Moussa said a bad atmosphere in relations stemmed from the initial policies and actions of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu after he was elected last May.

"The bad atmosphere was not personal," Moussa told Reuters. "We had reservations about certain policies and practices, but we see in the Hebron agreement [signed last month] and in particular the time frame for further withdrawals a positive sign that would help change the atmosphere.

"Now we have to actively pursue the rest of the steps of the Palestinian-Israeli track, first of which is to withdraw or redeploy from the villages and the rest of the land of the Palestinians – this will be the key to change," he added.

Moussa said Syria, which has had no direct talks with the present Israeli government, has good reason to be suspicious of Israel's commitment to anything it signs.

"But if the Hebron agreement and the annexed [agreement] on the next steps are implemented, then the Syrians and Lebanese will see that Israel is respecting what it has signed. So the signing of the Hebron agreement, coupled with implementation, would certainly encourage the Syrians and Lebanese or at least show there is a positive point in getting a deal with the government of Israel," he added.

Meanwhile, Foreign Minister David Levy said after meeting French President Jacques Chirac last week that peace talks with Syria are not frozen and that France wants to help narrow Israeli-Syrian differences.

Levy accused Syria of direct responsibility for last week's attack in which three IDF soldiers were killed by Hezbollah. "Syria is more than directly responsible [for events in south Lebanon]. It transfers weapons that arrive from Iran. Such behavior is not compatible with Syria's declarations about its desire to achieve peace.

"If peace serves the interests of both sides, Syria has an opportunity to prove the sincerity of its declarations. It must contribute to creating the conditions which will bring us to resume the peace talks," Levy said.

The future of Israeli-Syrian peace talks and the situation in Lebanon were the two major topics Levy discussed with Chirac and with his French counterpart, Herve de-Charette.

Levy tried to tone down tensions with Syria, speaking about the need to avoid a verbal war and to resume negotiations as quickly as possible.

Chirac told Levy that the Syrians are willing to examine every proposal that would help bridge the gap between the two countries' positions. Levy said he did not ask Chirac to transmit any message to Damascus, saying he is waiting to hear from the EU special envoy to the Middle East, who visited the Syrian capital last week.

Over the weekend, the United States also warned Syria to put a halt to Hezbollah attacks on the IDF in southern Lebanon.

In Washington, a senior administration official would not confirm whether Secretary of State Madeleine Albright spoke with Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk Shara on the matter, but said, "We have communicated these views to the Syrians."

Washington is aware that the attack could be linked to recent efforts to bring about a resumption of Israeli-Syrian peace talks, and the United States is once again telling Damascus that the link must be cut, he said.

The official added that with Netanyahu coming to the United States next week to discuss with President Bill Clinton how to resume the talks, Syria ought to create a better climate by clamping down on Hezbollah.

Unilateral Lebanon pullout rejected

By Jerusalem Post Staff

JERUSALEM — A unilateral IDF withdrawal from the security zone will not solve Israel's conflict in Lebanon nor will it ensure the security of the north, Chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. Amnon Shahak said recently.

"There is no one with whom to make a deal. As far as I know, the Lebanese government is not willing and is not able to take responsibility in [south Lebanon.] If it could take responsibility it could have prevented the past two Katyusha attacks on the north," said Shahak, who was speaking to reporters while visiting Roi Regev at Haifa's Rambam Hospital. Regev, a 19-year-old soldier, was moderately wounded in south Lebanon last week. His condition has improved and he was recently moved out of the intensive care unit.

"In the meantime, we must continue to rely only on ourselves... and continue fighting in south Lebanon," he said.

Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai, who was visiting the hospital with Shahak, said he held Lebanon responsible for what happens in its territory. Mordechai said such attacks do not help the peace process, and warned all those who use terror in south Lebanon that they should know the consequences of such moves.

At the same time, he said "we must move forward in the search for formulas for reaching a settlement in Lebanon."

Mordechai, Shahak and OC Northern Command Maj.-Gen. Amiram Levine also visited IDF posts on the Lebanese border and were given a report on the recent attack.

Meanwhile, one of the fallen soldiers, Sgt. Niv Sadan was buried last week at Kibbutz Megiddo in the Jezreel Valley. Hundreds of comrades, family members and friends attended the funeral.

Tension remained high in southern Lebanon as Hezbollah detonated a roadside bomb near an infantry patrol of the South Lebanese Army militia.

But Lebanese security officials said there were no casualties in that attack or in a rocket strike later in the day on an SLA outpost in the mountains. There was no responsibility claimed for that attack.

Last week, Israeli helicopter gunships strafed suspected guerrilla positions in the south, apparently in pursuit of infiltrators who detonated a roadside bomb earlier in the day near an IDF patrol, causing no casualties.

Israeli diplomacy focusing on Syria

Indirect contacts already initiated

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

When Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu meets President Bill Clinton at the White House next week, one of the topics high on the agenda will be Israel's suspended peace talks with Syria.

Mideast Analysis

The focus has shifted to Israel's unfinished business with Syria now that Israel and the PLO have finally signed the long-delayed Hebron agreement, a breakthrough which sets the stage for final status negotiations .

With substantive progress having been registered on the Palestinian track, Israel has launched a diplomatic campaign whose objective is nothing less than the resumption of bilateral talks with Syria.

In the past two weeks, Netanyahu has said that he will "spare no effort" to resume the negotiations, Foreign Minister David Levy has initiated indirect contacts with Syria and issued a fervent appeal to Damascus to rejoin the talks, and Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai has predicted that they will start up again by the spring.

Meanwhile, in Cairo, top-ranking Syrian officials – Vice-President Abdul-Halim Khaddam and Foreign Minister Farouk Sharaa – have discussed developments with President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt.

Israel broke off negotiations with Syria almost a year ago, upset by Syria's failure to condemn the wave of Palestinian suicide bombings in Israeli cities. Since then, the political impasse has turned downright nasty, touching off a war of words between Israel and Syria.

Last summer, rumors of war swept the region, triggered by ominous Syrian and Israeli military manoeuvres on the Golan. Then Israel's deputy chief of staff, Gen. Matan Vilna'i, bluntly declared that "the likelihood of war is greater than it was a year or two ago."

The tension increased when the Damascus-based Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine claimed responsibility for a terrorist attack near Ramallah on Dec. 11, 1996, which claimed the lives of two Israeli settlers. And it was further heightened when Syria blamed Israel for a still unsolved bus bombing in Damascus which killed nine civilians and wounded 44.

Despite these worrisome incidents, neither Israel nor Syria have given up on peace. But the gap in their respective positions is such that it engenders a sense of pessimism.
